18. Owing to the doubtful customary nature of the ICC Statutory crime which criminalizes the conscription or enlistment of children under the age of 15, whether forced or "voluntary", the crime which is included in article 4 (c) of the Statute of the Special Court is not the equivalent of the ICC provision. While the definition of the crime as "conscripting" or "enlisting" connotes an administrative act of putting one's name on a list and formal entry into the armed forces, the elements of the crime under the proposed Statute of the Special Court are: (a) abduction, which in the case of the children of Sierra Leone was the original crime and is in itself a crime under common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions; (b) forced recruitment in the most general sense — administrative formalities, obviously, notwithstanding; and (c) transformation of the child into, and its use as, among other degrading uses, a "child-combatant".

2873

5507

2. Crimes under Sierra Leonean law

19. The Security Council recommended that the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Special Court should also include crimes under relevant Sierra Leonean law committed within the territory of Sierra Leone. While most of the crimes committed in the Sierra Leonean conflict during the relevant period are governed by the international law provisions set out in articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, recourse to Sierra Leonean law has been had in cases where a specific situation or an aspect of it was considered to be either unregulated or inadequately regulated under international law. The crimes considered to be relevant for this purpose and included in the Statute are: offences relating to the abuse of girls under the 1926 Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act and offences relating to the wanton destruction of property, and in particular arson, under the 1861 Malicious Damage Act.

20. The applicability of two systems of law implies that the elements of the crimes are governed by the respective international or national law, and that the Rules of Evidence differ according to the nature of the crime as a common or international crime. In that connection, article 14 of the Statute provides that the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda shall be applicable mutatis mutandis to proceedings before the Special Court, and that the judges shall have the power to amend or adopt additional rules, where a specific situation is not provided for. In so doing, they may be guided, as appropriate, by the 1965 Criminal Procedure Act of Sierra Leone.

B. Temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court

21. In addressing the question of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court as requested by the Security Council, a determination of the validity of the sweeping amnesty granted under the Lomé Peace Agreement of 7 July 1999 was first required. If valid, it would limit the temporal jurisdiction of the Court to offences committed after 7 July 1999; if invalid, it would make possible a determination of a beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court at any time in the pre-Lomé period.

1. The amnesty clause in the Lomé Peace Agreement

22. While recognizing that amnesty is an accepted legal concept and a gesture of peace and reconciliation at the end of a civil war or an internal armed conflict,[4] the United Nations has consistently maintained the position that amnesty cannot be granted in respect of international crimes, such as genocide, crimes against humanity or other serious violations of international humanitarian law.

23. At the time of the signature of the Lomé Peace Agreement, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Sierra Leone was instructed to append to his signature on behalf of the United Nations a disclaimer to the effect that the amnesty provision contained in article IX of the Agreement ("absolute and free pardon") shall not apply to international crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law. This reservation is recalled by the Security Council in a preambular paragraph of resolution 1315 (2000).

24. In the negotiations on the Statute of the Special Court, the Government of Sierra Leone concurred with the position of the United Nations and agreed to the inclusion of an amnesty clause which would read as follows:

> "An amnesty granted to any person falling within the jurisdiction of the Special Court in respect of the crimes referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall not be a bar to prosecution."

With the denial of legal effect to the amnesty granted at Lomé, to the extent of its illegality under international law, the obstacle to the determination of a beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court within the pre-Lomé period has been removed.

2. Beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction

25. It is generally accepted that the decade-long civil war in Sierra Leone dates back to 1991, when on 23 March of that year forces of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) entered Sierra Leone from Liberia and launched a rebellion to overthrow the one-party military rule of the All People's Congress (APC). In determining a beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court within the period since

2874

5501

23 March 1991, the Secretary-General has been guided by the following considerations: (a) the temporal jurisdiction should be reasonably limited in time so that the Prosecutor is not overburdened and the Court overloaded; (b) the beginning date should correspond to an event or a new phase in the conflict without necessarily having any political connotations; and (c) it should encompass the most serious crimes committed by persons of all political and military groups and in all geographical areas of the country. A temporal jurisdiction limited in any of these respects would rightly be perceived as a selective or discriminatory justice.

26. Imposing a temporal jurisdiction on the Special Court reaching back to 1991 would create a heavy burden for the prosecution and the Court. The following alternative dates were therefore considered as realistic options:

(a) 30 November 1996 — the conclusion of the Abidjan Peace Agreement, the first comprehensive Peace Agreement between the Government of Sierra Leone and RUF. Soon after its signature the Peace Agreement had collapsed and large-scale hostilities had resumed;

(b) 25 May 1997 — the date of the coup d'état orchestrated by the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) against the Government that was democratically elected in early 1996. The period which ensued was characterized by serious violations of international humanitarian law, including, in particular, mass rape and abduction of women, forced recruitment of children and summary executions;

(c) 6 January 1999 — the date on which RUF/AFRC launched a military operation to take control of Freetown. The first three-week period of full control by these entities over Freetown marked the most intensified, systematic and widespread violations of human rights and international humanitarian law against the civilian population. During its retreat in February 1999, RUF abducted hundreds of young people, particularly young women used as forced labourers, fighting forces, human shields and sexual slaves.

27. In considering the three options for the beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court, the parties have concluded that the choice of 30 November 1996 would have the benefit of putting the Sierra Leone conflict in perspective without unnecessarily extending the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court. It would also ensure that the most serious crimes committed by all parties and armed groups would be encompassed within its jurisdiction. The choice of 25 May 1997 would have all these advantages, with the disadvantage of having a political connotation, implying, wrongly, that the prosecution of those responsible for the most serious violations of international humanitarian law is aimed at punishment for their participation in the coup d'état. The last option marks in many ways the peak of the campaign of systematic and widespread crimes against the civilian population, as experienced mostly by the inhabitants of Freetown. If the temporal jurisdiction of the Court were to be limited to that period only, it would exclude all crimes committed before that period in the rural areas and the countryside. In view of the perceived advantages of the first option and the disadvantages associated with the other options, the date of 30 November 1996 was selected as the beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court, a decision in which the government negotiators have actively concurred.

28. As the armed conflict in various parts of the territory of Sierra Leone is still ongoing, it was decided that the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court should be left open-ended. The lifespan of the Special Court, however, as distinguished from its temporal jurisdiction, will be determined by a subsequent agreement between the parties upon the completion of its judicial activities, an indication of the capacity acquired by the local courts to assume the prosecution of the remaining cases, or the unavailability of resources. In setting an end to the operation of the Court, the Agreement would also determine all matters relating to enforcement of sentences, pardon or commutation, transfer of pending cases to the local courts and the disposition of the financial and other assets of the Special Court.

C. Personal jurisdiction

1. Persons "most responsible"

29. In its resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council recommended that the personal jurisdiction of the Special Court should extend to those "who bear the greatest responsibility for the commission of the crimes", which is understood as an indication of a limitation on the number of accused by reference to their command authority and the gravity and scale of the crime. I propose, however, that the more general term "persons most responsible" should be used.

2875

5502

30. While those "most responsible" obviously include the political or military leadership, others in command authority down the chain of command may also be regarded "most responsible" judging by the severity of the crime or its massive scale. "Most responsible", therefore, denotes both a leadership or authority position of the accused, and a sense of the gravity, seriousness or massive scale of the crime. It must be seen, however, not as a test criterion or a distinct jurisdictional threshold, but as a guidance to the Prosecutor in the adoption of a prosecution strategy and in making decisions to prosecute in individual cases.

31. Within the meaning attributed to it in the present Statute, the term "most responsible" would not necessarily exclude children between 15 and 18 years of age. While it is inconceivable that children could be in a political or military leadership position (although in Sierra Leone the rank of "Brigadier" was often granted to children as young as 11 years), the gravity and seriousness of the crimes they have allegedly committed would allow for their inclusion within the jurisdiction of the Court.

2. Individual criminal responsibility at 15 years of age

32. The possible prosecution of children for crimes against humanity and war crimes presents a difficult moral dilemma. More than in any other conflict where children have been used as combatants, in Sierra Leone, child combatants were initially abducted, forcibly recruited, sexually abused, reduced to slavery of all kinds and trained, often under the influence of drugs, to kill, maim and burn. Though feared by many for their brutality, most if not all of these children have been subjected to a process of psychological and physical abuse and duress which has transformed them from victims into perpetrators.

33. The solution to this terrible dilemma with respect to the Special Court[5] could be found in a number of options: (a) determining a minimum age of 18 and exempting all persons under that age from accountability and individual criminal responsibility; (b) having children between 15 to 18 years of age, both victims and perpetrators, recount their story before the Truth and Reconciliation Commission or similar mechanisms, none of which is as yet functional; and (c) having them go through the judicial process of accountability without punishment, in a court of law providing all internationally recognized guarantees of juvenile justice.

34. The question of child prosecution was discussed at length with the Government of Sierra Leone both in New York and in Freetown. It was raised with all the interlocutors of the United Nations team: the members of the judiciary, members of the legal profession and the Ombudsman, and was vigorously debated with members of civil society, non-governmental organizations and institutions actively engaged in child-care and rehabilitation programmes.

35. The Government of Sierra Leone and representatives of Sierra Leone civil society clearly wish to see a process of judicial accountability for child combatants presumed responsible for the crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court. It was said that the people of Sierra Leone would not look kindly upon a court which failed to bring to justice children who committed crimes of that nature and spared them the judicial process of accountability. The international non-governmental organizations responsible for child-care and rehabilitation programmes, together with some of their national counterparts, however, were unanimous in their objection to any kind of judicial accountability for children below 18 years of age for fear that such a process would place at risk the entire rehabilitation programme so painstakingly achieved. While the extent to which this view represents the majority view of the people of Sierra Leone is debatable, it nevertheless underscores the importance of the child rehabilitation programme and the need to ensure that in the prosecution of children presumed responsible, the rehabilitation process of scores of other children is not endangered.

36. Given these highly diverging opinions, it is not easy to strike a balance between the interests at stake. I am mindful of the Security Council's recommendation that only those who bear "the greatest responsibility" should be prosecuted. However, in view of the most horrific aspects of the child combatancy in Sierra Leone, the employment of this term would not necessarily exclude persons of young age from the jurisdiction of the Court. I therefore thought that it would be most prudent to demonstrate to the Security Council for its consideration how provisions on prosecution of persons below the age of 18 — "children" within the definition of the Convention on the Rights of the Child — before an international jurisdiction could be formulated.[6] Therefore, in order to meet the concerns expressed by, in particular, those responsible for child care and rehabilitation programmes, article 15, paragraph 5, of the Statute contains the following provision:

2876

5503

> "In the prosecution of juvenile offenders, the Prosecutor shall ensure that the child-rehabilitation programme is not placed at risk, and that, where appropriate, resort should be had to alternative truth and reconciliation mechanisms, to the extent of their availability."

37. Furthermore, the Statute of the Special Court, in article 7 and throughout the text, contains internationally recognized standards of juvenile justice and guarantees that juvenile offenders are treated in dignity and with a sense of worth. Accordingly, the overall composition of the judges should reflect their experiences in a variety of fields, including in juvenile justice (article 13, para. 1); the Office of the Prosecutor should be staffed with persons experienced in gender-related crimes and juvenile justice (article 15, para. 4). In a trial of a juvenile offender, the Special Court should, to the extent possible, order the immediate release of the accused, constitute a "Juvenile Chamber", order the separation of the trial of a juvenile from that of an adult, and provide all legal and other assistance and order protective measures to ensure the privacy of the juvenile. The penalty of imprisonment is excluded in the case of a juvenile offender, and a number of alternative options of correctional or educational nature are provided for instead.

38. Consequently, if the Council, also weighing in the moral-educational message to the present and next generation of children in Sierra Leone, comes to the conclusion that persons under the age of 18 should be eligible for prosecution, the statutory provisions elaborated will strike an appropriate balance between all conflicting interests and provide the necessary guarantees of juvenile justice. It should also be stressed that, ultimately, it will be for the Prosecutor to decide if, all things considered, action should be taken against a juvenile offender in any individual case.

IV. Organizational structure of the Special Court

39. Organizationally, the Special Court has been conceived as a self-contained entity, consisting of three organs: the Chambers (two Trial Chambers and an Appeals Chamber), the Prosecutor's Office and the Registry. In the establishment of ad hoc international tribunals or special courts operating as separate institutions, independently of the relevant national legal system, it has proved to be necessary to comprise within one and the same entity all three organs. Like the two International Tribunals, the Special Court for Sierra Leone is established outside the national court system, and the inclusion of the Appeals Chamber within the same Court was thus the obvious choice.

A. The Chambers

40. In its resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council requested that the question of the advisability, feasibility and appropriateness of sharing the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda should be addressed. In analysing this option from the legal and practical viewpoints, I have concluded that the sharing of a single Appeals Chamber between jurisdictions as diverse as the two International Tribunals and the Special Court for Sierra Leone is legally unsound and practically not feasible, without incurring unacceptably high administrative and financial costs.

41. While in theory the establishment of an overarching Appeals Chamber as the ultimate judicial authority in matters of interpretation and application of international humanitarian law offers a guarantee of developing a coherent body of law, in practice, the same result may be achieved by linking the jurisprudence of the Special Court to that of the International Tribunals, without imposing on the shared Appeals Chamber the financial and administrative constraints of a formal institutional link. Article 20, paragraph 3, of the Statute accordingly provides that the judges of the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court shall be guided by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the Yugoslav and the Rwanda Tribunals; article 14, paragraph 1, of the Statute provides that the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Rwanda Tribunal shall be applicable mutatis mutandis to the proceedings before the Special Court.

2977

5504

42. The sharing of one Appeals chamber between all three jurisdictions would strain the capacity of the already heavily burdened Appeals Chamber of the two Tribunals in ways which could either bring about the collapse of the appeals system as a whole, or delay beyond acceptable human rights standards the detention of accused pending the hearing of appeals from either or all jurisdictions. On the assumption that all judgements and sentencing decisions of the Trial Chambers of the Special Court will be appealed, as they have been in the cases of the two International Tribunals, and that the number of accused will be roughly the same as in each of the International Tribunals, the Appeals Chamber would be required to add to its current workload a gradual increase of approximately one third.

43. Faced with an exponential growth in the number of appeals lodged on judgements and interlocutory appeals in relation to an increasing number of accused and decisions rendered, the existing workload of the Appeals Chamber sitting in appeals from six Trial Chambers of the two ad hoc Tribunals is constantly growing. Based on current and anticipated growth in workload, existing trends[7] and the projected pace of three to six appeals on judgements every year, the Appeals Chamber has requested additional resources in funds and personnel. With the addition of two Trial Chambers of the Special Court, making a total of eight Trial Chambers for one Appeals Chamber, the burden on the Yugoslav and Rwanda Appeals Chamber would be untenable, and the Special Court would be deprived of an effective and viable appeals process.

44. The financial costs which would be entailed for the Appeals Chamber when sitting on appeals from the Special Court will have to be borne by the regular budget, regardless of the financial mechanism established for the Special Court itself. These financial costs would include also costs of translation into French, which is one of the working languages of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals; the working language of the Special Court will be English.

45. In his letter to the Legal Counsel in response to the request for comments on the eventuality of sharing the Appeals Chamber of the two international Tribunals with the Special Court, the President of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia wrote:

> "With regard to paragraph 7 of Security Council resolution 1315 (2000), while the sharing of the Appeals Chamber of [the two International Tribunals] with that of the Special Court would bear the significant advantage of ensuring a better standardization of international humanitarian law, it appeared that the disadvantages of this option — excessive increase of the Appeals Chambers' workload, problems arising from the mixing of sources of law, problems caused by the increase in travelling by the judges of the Appeals Chambers and difficulties caused by mixing the different judges of the three tribunals — outweigh its benefits."[8]

46. For these reasons, the parties came to the conclusion that the Special Court should have two Trial Chambers, each with three judges, and an Appeals Chamber with five judges. Article 12, paragraph 4, provides for extra judges to sit on the bench in cases where protracted proceedings can be foreseen and it is necessary to make certain that the proceedings do not have to be discontinued in case one of the ordinary judges is unable to continue hearing the case.

B. The Prosecutor

47. An international prosecutor will be appointed by the Secretary-General to lead the investigations and prosecutions, with a Sierra Leonean Deputy. The appointment of an international prosecutor will guarantee that the Prosecutor is, and is seen to be, independent, objective and impartial.

C. The Registrar

48. The Registrar will service the Chambers and the Office of the Prosecutor and will have the responsibility for the financial management and external relations of the Court. The Registrar will be appointed by the Secretary-General as a staff member of the United Nations.

V. Enforcement of sentences

49. The possibility of serving prison sentences in third States is provided for in article 22 of the Statute. While imprisonment shall normally be served in Sierra Leone, particular circumstances, such as the security risk entailed in the continued imprisonment of some of the convicted persons on Sierra Leonean territory, may require their relocation to a third State.

2878

50. Enforcement of sentences in third countries will be based on an agreement between the Special Court[9] and the State of enforcement. In seeking indications of the willingness of States to accept convicted persons, priority should be given to those which have already concluded similar agreements with either of the International Tribunals, as an indication that their prison facilities meet the minimum standards of conditions of detention. Although an agreement for the enforcement of sentences will be concluded between the Court and the State of enforcement, the wishes of the Government of Sierra Leone should be respected. In that connection, preference was expressed for such locations to be identified in an East African State.

VI. An alternative host country

51. In paragraph 7 of resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council requested that the question of a possible alternative host State be addressed, should it be necessary to convene the Special Court outside its seat in Sierra Leone, if circumstances so required. As the efforts of the United Nations Secretariat, the Government of Sierra Leone and other interested Member States are currently focused on the establishment of the Special Court in Sierra Leone, it is proposed that the question of the alternative seat should be addressed in phases. An important element in proceeding with this issue is also the way in which the Security Council addresses the present report, that is, if a Chapter VII element is included.

52. In the first phase, criteria for the choice of the alternative seat should be determined and a range of potential host countries identified. An agreement, in principle, should be sought both from the Government of Sierra Leone for the transfer of the Special Court to the State of the alternative seat, and from the authorities of the latter, for the relocation of the seat to its territory.

53. In the second phase, a technical assessment team would be sent to identify adequate premises in the third State or States. Once identified, the three parties, namely, the United Nations, the Government of Sierra Leone and the Government of the alternative seat, would conclude a Framework Agreement, or "an agreement to agree" for the transfer of the seat when circumstances so required. The Agreement would stipulate the nature of the circumstances which would require the transfer of the seat and an undertaking to conclude in such an eventuality a Headquarters Agreement. Such a principled Agreement would facilitate the transfer of the seat on an emergency basis and enable the conclusion of a Headquarters Agreement soon thereafter.

54. In the choice of an alternative seat for the Special Court, the following considerations should be taken into account: the proximity to the place where the crimes were committed, and easy access to victims, witnesses and accused. Such proximity and easy access will greatly facilitate the work of the Prosecutor, who will continue to conduct his investigations in the territory of Sierra Leone.[10] During the negotiations, the Government expressed a preference for a West African alternative seat, in an English-speaking country sharing a common-law legal system.

VII. Practical arrangements for the operation of the Special Court

55. The Agreement and the Statute of the Special Court establish the legal and institutional framework of the Court and the mutual obligations of the parties with regard, in particular, to appointments to the Chambers, the Office of the Prosecutor and the Registry and, the provision of premises. However, the practical arrangements for the establishment and operation of the Special Court remain outside the scope of the Agreement in the sense that they depend on contributions of personnel, equipment, services and funds from Member States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations. It is somewhat anomalous, therefore, that the parties which establish the Special Court, in practice, are dependent for the implementation of their treaty obligations on States and international organizations which are not parties to the Agreement or otherwise bound by its provisions.

56. Proceeding from the premise that voluntary contributions would constitute the financial mechanism of the Special Court, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to include in the report recommendations regarding the amount of voluntary contributions, as appropriate, of funds, equipment and services to the Special Court, contributions in personnel, the kind of advice and expertise expected of the two ad hoc Tribunals, and the type of support and technical assistance to be provided by UNAMSIL. In considering the estimated requirements of the Special Court in all of these respects, it must be borne in mind that at the current stage, the Government of Sierra Leone is unable to contribute in any significant way to the operational costs of the Special Court, other than in the provision of premises, which would require substantial refurbishment, and the appointment of personnel, some of whom may not even be Sierra Leonean nationals. The requirements set out below should therefore be understood for all practical purposes as requirements that have to be met through contributions from sources other than the Government of Sierra Leone.

A. Estimated requirements of the Special Court for the first operational phase

1. Personnel and equipment

57. The personnel requirements of the Special Court for the initial operational phase[11] are estimated to include:

(a) Eight Trial Chamber judges (3 sitting judges and 1 alternate judge in each Chamber) and 6 Appeals Chamber judges (5 sitting judges and 1 alternate judge), 1 law clerk, 2 support staff for each Chamber and 1 security guard detailed to each judge (14);

(b) A Prosecutor and a Deputy Prosecutor, 20 investigators, 20 prosecutors and 26 support staff;

(c) A Registrar, a Deputy Registrar, 27 administrative support staff and 40 security officers;

(d) Four staff in the Victims and Witnesses Unit;

(e) One correction officer and 12 security officers in the detention facilities.

58. Based on the United Nations scale of salaries for a one-year period, the personnel requirements along with the corresponding equipment and vehicles are estimated on a very preliminary basis to be US$ 22 million. The calculation of the personnel requirements is premised on the assumption that all persons appointed (whether by the United Nations or the Government of Sierra Leone) will be paid from United Nations sources.

59. In seeking qualified personnel from States Members of the United Nations, the importance of obtaining such personnel from members of the Commonwealth, sharing the same language and common-law legal system, has been recognized. The Office of Legal Affairs has therefore approached the Commonwealth Secretariat with a request to identify possible candidates for the positions of judges, prosecutors, Registrar, investigators and administrative support staff. How many of the Commonwealth countries would be in a position to voluntarily contribute such personnel with their salaries and emoluments is an open question. A request similar to that which has been made to the Commonwealth will also be made to the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS).

2. Premises

60. The second most significant component of the requirements of the Court for the first operational phase is the cost of premises. During its visit to Freetown, the United Nations team visited a number of facilities and buildings which the Government believes may accommodate the Special Court and its detention facilities: the High Court of Sierra Leone, the Miatta Conference Centre and an adjacent hotel, the Presidential Lodge, the Central Prison (Pademba Road Prison), and the New England Prison. In evaluating their state of operation, the team concluded that none of the facilities offered were suitable or could be made operational without substantial investment. The use of the existing High Court would incur the least expenditure (estimated at $1.5 million); but would considerably disrupt the ordinary schedule of the Court and eventually bring it to a halt. Since it is located in central Freetown, the use of the High Court would pose, in addition, serious security risks. The use of the Conference Centre, the most secure site visited, would require large-scale renovation, estimated at $5.8 million. The Presidential Lodge was ruled out on security grounds.

61. In the light of the above, the team has considered the option of constructing a prefabricated, self-contained compound on government land. This option would have the advantage of an easy expansion paced with the growth of the Special Court, a salvage value at the completion of the activities of the Court, the prospect of a donation in kind and construction at no rental costs. The estimated cost of this option is $2.9 million.

5507

62. The two detention facilities visited by the team were found to be inadequate in their current state. The Central Prison (Pademba Road Prison) was ruled out for lack of space and security reasons. The New England Prison would be a possible option at an estimated renovation cost of $600,000.

63. The estimated cost requirements of personnel and premises set out in the present report cover the two most significant components of its prospective budget for the first operational stage. Not included in the present report are the general operational costs of the Special Court and of the detention facilities; costs of prosecutorial and investigative activities; conference services, including the employment of court translators from and into English, Krio and other tribal languages; and defence counsel, to name but a few.

B. Expertise and advice from the two International Tribunals

64. The kind of advice and expertise which the two International Tribunals may be expected to share with the Special Court for Sierra Leone could take the form of any or all of the following: consultations among judges of both jurisdictions on matters of mutual interest; training of prosecutors, investigators and administrative support staff of the Special Court in The Hague, Kigali and Arusha, and training of such personnel on the spot by a team of prosecutors, investigators and administrators from both Tribunals; advice on the requirements for a Court library and assistance in its establishment, and sharing of information, documents, judgements and other relevant legal material on a continuous basis.

65. Both International Tribunals have expressed willingness to share their experience in all of these respects with the Special Court. They have accordingly offered to convene regular meetings with the judges of the Special Court to assist in adopting and formulating Rules of Procedure based on experience acquired in the practice of both Tribunals; to train personnel of the Special Court in The Hague and Arusha to enable them to acquire practical knowledge of the operation of an international tribunal; and when necessary, to temporarily deploy experienced staff, including a librarian, to the Special Court. In addition, the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia has offered to provide to the Special Court legal material in the form of CD-ROMs containing motions, decisions, judgements, court orders and the like. The transmission of such material to the Special Court in the period pending the establishment of a full-fledged library would be of great assistance.

C. Support and technical assistance from UNAMSIL

66. The support and technical assistance of UNAMSIL in providing security, logistics, administrative support and temporary accommodation would be necessary in the first operational phase of the Special Court. In the precarious security situation now prevailing in Sierra Leone and given the state of the national security forces, UNAMSIL represents the only credible force capable of providing adequate security to the personnel and the premises of the Special Court. The specificities of the security measures required would have to be elaborated by the United Nations, the Government of Sierra Leone and UNAMSIL, it being understood, however, that any such additional tasks entrusted to UNAMSIL would have to be approved by the Security Council and reflected in a revised mandate with a commensurate increase in financial, staff and other resources.

67. UNAMSIL's administrative support could be provided in the areas of finance, personnel and procurement. Utilizing the existing administrative support in UNAMSIL, including, when feasible, shared facilities and communication systems, would greatly facilitate the start-up phase of the Special Court and reduce the overall resource requirements. In that connection, limited space at the headquarters of UNAMSIL could be made available for the temporary accommodation of the Office of the Prosecutor, pending the establishment or refurbishment of a site for the duration of the Special Court.

VIII. Financial mechanism of the Special Court

68. In paragraph 8 (c) of resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to include recommendations on "the amount of voluntary contributions, as appropriate, of funds, equipment and services to the special court, including through the offer of expert personnel that may be needed from States, intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations". It would thus seem that the intention of the Council is that a Special Court for Sierra Leone would be financed from voluntary contributions. Implicit in the Security Council resolution, therefore, given the paucity of resources available to the Government of Sierra Leone, was the intention that most if not all operational costs of the Special Court would be borne by States Members of the Organization in the form of voluntary contributions.

2881

5508

69. The experience gained in the operation of the two ad hoc International Tribunals provides an indication of the scope, costs and long-term duration of the judicial activities of an international jurisdiction of this kind. While the Special Court differs from the two Tribunals in its nature and legal status, the similarity in the kind of crimes committed, the temporal, territorial and personal scope of jurisdiction, the number of accused, the organizational structure of the Court and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence suggest a similar scope and duration of operation and a similar need for a viable and sustainable financial mechanism.

70. A financial mechanism based entirely on voluntary contributions will not provide the assured and continuous source of funding which would be required to appoint the judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar, to contract the services of all administrative and support staff and to purchase the necessary equipment. The risks associated with the establishment of an operation of this kind with insufficient funds, or without long-term assurances of continuous availability of funds, are very high, in terms of both moral responsibility and loss of credibility of the Organization, and its exposure to legal liability. In entering into contractual commitments which the Special Court and, vicariously, the Organization might not be able to honour, the United Nations would expose itself to unlimited third-party liability. A special court based on voluntary contributions would be neither viable nor sustainable.

71. In my view, the only realistic solution is financing through assessed contributions. This would produce a viable and sustainable financial mechanism affording secure and continuous funding. It is understood, however, that the financing of the Special Court through assessed contributions of the Member States would for all practical purposes transform a treaty-based court into a United Nations organ governed in its financial and administrative activities by the relevant United Nations financial and staff regulations and rules.

72. The Security Council may wish to consider an alternative solution, based on the concept of a "national jurisdiction" with international assistance, which would rely on the existing — however inadequate — Sierra Leonean court system, both in terms of premises (for the Court and the detention facilities) and administrative support. The judges, prosecutors, investigators and administrative support staff would be contributed by interested States. The legal basis for the special "national" court would be a national law, patterned on the Statute as agreed between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone (the international crimes being automatically incorporated into the Sierra Leonean common-law system). Since the mandate of the Secretary-General is to recommend measures consistent with resolution 1315 (2000), the present report does not elaborate further on this alternative other than to merely note its existence.

IX. Conclusion

73. At the request of the Security Council, the present report sets out the legal framework and practical arrangements for the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone. It describes the requirements of the Special Court in terms of funds, personnel and services and underscores the acute need for a viable financial mechanism to sustain it for the duration of its lifespan. It concludes that assessed contributions is the only viable and sustainable financial mechanism of the Special Court.

74. As the Security Council itself has recognized, in the past circumstances of Sierra Leone, a credible system of justice and accountability for the very serious crimes committed there would end impunity and would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace in that country. In reviewing the present report and considering what further action must be taken, the Council should bear in mind the expectations that have been created and the state of urgency that permeates all discussions of the problem of impunity in Sierra Leone.

2882

5509

Notes

[1] At the request of the Government, reference in the Statute and the Agreement to "Sierra Leonean judges" was replaced by "judges appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone". This would allow the Government flexibility of choice between Sierra Leonean and non-Sierra Leonean nationals and broaden the range of potential candidates from within and outside Sierra Leone.

[2] In the case of the Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, the non-inclusion in any position of nationals of the country most directly affected was considered a condition for the impartiality, objectivity and neutrality of the Tribunal.

[3] This method may not be advisable, since the Court would be manned by a substantial number of staff and financed through voluntary contributions in the amount of millions of dollars every year.

[4] Article 6, paragraph 5, of the 1977 Protocol II Additional to the Geneva Conventions and Relating to the Protection of Non-international Armed Conflicts provides that:

> "At the end of hostilities, the authorities in power shall endeavour to grant the broadest possible amnesty to persons who have participated in the armed conflict, or those deprived of their liberty for reasons related to the armed conflict, whether they are interned or detained."

[5] The jurisdiction of the national courts of Sierra Leone is not limited by the Statute, except in cases where they have to defer to the Special Court.

[6] While there is no international law standard for the minimum age for criminal responsibility, the ICC Statute excludes from the jurisdiction of the Court persons under the age of 18. In so doing, however, it was not the intention of its drafters to establish, in general, a minimum age for individual criminal responsibility. Premised on the notion of complementarity between national courts and ICC, it was intended that persons under 18 presumed responsible for the crimes for which the ICC had jurisdiction would be brought before their national courts, if the national law in question provides for such jurisdiction over minors.

[7] The Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia has so far disposed of a total of 5 appeals from judgements and 44 interlocutory appeals; and the Appeals Chamber of the Rwanda Tribunal of only 1 judgement on the merits with 28 interlocutory appeals.

[8] Letter addressed to Mr. Hans Corell, Under-Secretary-General, The Legal Counsel, from Judge Claude Jorda, President of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, dated 29 August 2000.

[9] Article 10 of the Agreement between the United Nations and the Government endows the Special Court with a treaty-making power "to enter into agreements with States as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions and for the operation of the Court".

[10] Criteria for the choice of the seat of the Rwanda Tribunal were drawn up by the Security Council in its resolution 955 (1994). The Security Council decided that the seat of the International Tribunal shall be determined by the Council "having regard to considerations of justice and fairness as well as administrative efficiency, including access to witnesses, and economy".

[11] It is important to stress that this estimate should be regarded as an illustration of a possible scenario. Not until the Registrar and the Prosecutor are in place will it be possible to make detailed and precise estimates.

2883

5510

Annex

Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone on the Establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone

Whereas the Security Council, in its resolution 1315 (2000) of 14 August 2000, expressed deep concern at the very serious crimes committed within the territory of Sierra Leone against the people of Sierra Leone and United Nations and associated personnel and at the prevailing situation of impunity;

Whereas by the said resolution, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to negotiate an agreement with the Government of Sierra Leone to create an independent special court to prosecute persons who bear the greatest responsibility for the commission of serious violations of international humanitarian law and crimes committed under Sierra Leonean law;

Whereas the Secretary-General of the United Nations (hereinafter "the Secretary-General") and the Government of Sierra Leone (hereinafter "the Government") have held such negotiations for the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone (hereinafter "the Special Court");

Now therefore the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone have agreed as follows:

Article 1
Establishment of the Special Court

1. There is hereby established a Special Court for Sierra Leone to prosecute persons most responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law committed in the territory of Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996.

2. The Special Court shall function in accordance with the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone. The Statute is annexed to this Agreement and forms an integral part thereof.

Article 2
Composition of the Special Court and appointment of judges

1. The Special Court shall be composed of two Trial Chambers and an Appeals Chamber.

2. The Chambers shall be composed of eleven independent judges who shall serve as follows:

(a) Three judges shall serve in each of the Trial Chambers, of whom one shall be appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone, and two judges appointed by the Secretary-General upon nominations forwarded by States, and in particular the member States of the Economic Community of West African States and the Commonwealth, at the invitation of the Secretary-General;

(b) Five judges shall serve in the Appeals Chamber, of whom two shall be appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone and three judges shall be appointed by the Secretary-General upon nominations forwarded by States, and in particular the member States of the Economic Community of West African States and the Commonwealth, at the invitation of the Secretary-General.

2884

5511

3. The Government of Sierra Leone and the Secretary-General shall consult on the appointment of judges.

4. Judges shall be appointed for a four-year term and shall be eligible for reappointment.

5. In addition to the judges sitting in the Chambers and present at every stage of the proceedings, the presiding judge of a Trial Chamber or the Appeals Chamber shall designate an alternate judge appointed by either the Government of Sierra Leone or the Secretary-General to be present at each stage of the trial and to replace a judge if that judge is unable to continue sitting.

Article 3
Appointment of a Prosecutor and a Deputy Prosecutor

1. The Secretary-General, after consultation with the Government of Sierra Leone, shall appoint a Prosecutor for a four-year term. The Prosecutor shall be eligible for reappointment.

2. The Government of Sierra Leone, in consultation with the Secretary-General and the Prosecutor, shall appoint a Sierra Leonean Deputy Prosecutor to assist the Prosecutor in the conduct of the investigations and prosecutions.

3. The Prosecutor and the Deputy Prosecutor shall be of high moral character and possess the highest level of professional competence and extensive experience in the conduct of investigations and prosecution of criminal cases. The Prosecutor and the Deputy Prosecutor shall be independent in the performance of their functions and shall not accept or seek instructions from any Government or any other source.

4. The Prosecutor shall be assisted by such Sierra Leonean and international staff as may be required to perform the functions assigned to him or her effectively and efficiently.

Article 4
Appointment of a Registrar

1. The Secretary-General, in consultation with the President of the Special Court, shall appoint a Registrar who shall be responsible for the servicing of the Chambers and the Office of the Prosecutor, and for the recruitment and administration of all support staff. He or she shall also administer the financial and staff resources of the Special Court.

2. The Registrar shall be a staff member of the United Nations. He or she shall serve a four-year term and shall be eligible for reappointment.

Article 5
Premises

The Government shall provide the premises for the Special Court and such utilities, facilities and other services as may be necessary for its operation.

2885

Article 6
Expenses of the Special Court[a]

The expenses of the Special Court shall ...

Article 7
Inviolability of premises, archives and all other documents

1. The premises of the Special Court shall be inviolable. The competent authorities shall take whatever action may be necessary to ensure that the Special Court shall not be dispossessed of all or any part of the premises of the Court without its express consent.

2. The property, funds and assets of the Special Court, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall be immune from search, seizure, requisition, confiscation, expropriation and any other form of interference, whether by executive, administrative, judicial or legislative action.

3. The archives of the Court, and in general all documents and materials made available, belonging to or used by it, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall be inviolable.

Article 8
Funds, assets and other property

1. The Special Court, its funds, assets and other property, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall enjoy immunity from every form of legal process, except insofar as in any particular case the Court has expressly waived its immunity. It is understood, however, that no waiver of immunity shall extend to any measure of execution.

2. Without being restricted by financial controls, regulations or moratoriums of any kind, the Special Court:

(a) May hold and use funds, gold or negotiable instruments of any kind and maintain and operate accounts in any currency and convert any currency held by it into any other currency;

(b) Shall be free to transfer its funds, gold or currency from one country to another, or within Sierra Leone, to the United Nations or any other agency.

Article 9
Seat of the Special Court

The Special Court shall have its seat in Sierra Leone. The Court may meet away from its seat if it considers it necessary for the efficient exercise of its functions, and may be relocated outside Sierra Leone, if circumstances so require, and subject to the conclusion of a Headquarters Agreement between the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone, on the one hand, and the Government of the alternative seat, on the other.

[a] The formulation of this article is dependent on a decision on the financial mechanism of the Special Court.

5513

Article 10
Juridical capacity

The Special Court shall possess the juridical capacity necessary to:

(a) Contract;

(b) Acquire and dispose of movable and immovable property;

(c) Institute legal proceedings;

(d) Enter into agreements with States as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions and for the operation of the Court.

Article 11
Privileges and immunities of the judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar

1. The judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar, together with their families forming part of their household, shall enjoy the privileges and immunities, exemptions and facilities accorded to diplomatic agents in accordance with the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. They shall, in particular, enjoy:

(a) Personal inviolability, including immunity from arrest or detention;

(b) Immunity from criminal, civil and administrative jurisdiction in conformity with the Vienna Convention;

(c) Inviolability for all papers and documents;

(d) Exemption, as appropriate, from immigration restrictions and other alien registrations;

(e) The same immunities and facilities in respect of their personal baggage as are accorded to diplomatic agents by the Vienna Convention;

(f) Exemption from taxation in Sierra Leone on their salaries, emoluments and allowances.

2. Privileges and immunities are accorded to the judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar in the interest of the Special Court and not for the personal benefit of the individuals themselves. The right and the duty to waive the immunity, in any case where it can be waived without prejudice to the purpose for which it is accorded, shall lie with the Secretary-General, in consultation with the President.

Article 12
Privileges and immunities of international and Sierra Leonean personnel

1. Sierra Leonean and international personnel of the Special Court shall be accorded:

(a) Immunity from legal process in respect of words spoken or written and all acts performed by them in their official capacity. Such immunity shall continue to be accorded after termination of employment with the Special Court;

(b) Immunity from taxation on salaries, allowances and emoluments paid to them.

2. International personnel shall, in addition thereto, be accorded:

2287

5514

(a) Immunity from immigration restriction;

(b) The right to import free of duties and taxes, except for payment for services, their furniture and effects at the time of first taking up their official duties in Sierra Leone.

3. The privileges and immunities are granted to the officials of the Special Court in the interest of the Court and not for their personal benefit. The right and the duty to waive the immunity in any particular case where it can be waived without prejudice to the purpose for which it is accorded shall lie with the Registrar of the Court.

Article 13
Counsel

1. The Government shall ensure that the counsel of a suspect or an accused who has been admitted as such by the Special Court shall not be subjected to any measure which may affect the free and independent exercise of his or her functions.

2. In particular, the counsel shall be accorded:

(a) Immunity from personal arrest or detention and from seizure of personal baggage;

(b) Inviolability of all documents relating to the exercise of his or her functions as a counsel of a suspect or accused;

(c) Immunity from criminal or civil jurisdiction in respect of words spoken or written and acts performed in his or her capacity as counsel. Such immunity shall continue to be accorded after termination of his or her functions as a counsel of a suspect or accused.

Article 14
Witnesses and experts

Witnesses and experts appearing from outside Sierra Leone on a summons or a request of the judges or the Prosecutor shall not be prosecuted, detained or subjected to any restriction on their liberty by the Sierra Leonean authorities. They shall not be subjected to any measure which may affect the free and independent exercise of their functions.

Article 15
Security, safety and protection of persons referred to in this Agreement

Recognizing the responsibility of the Government under international law to ensure the security, safety and protection of persons referred to in this Agreement and its present incapacity to do so pending the restructuring and rebuilding of its security forces, it is agreed that the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone shall provide the necessary security to premises and personnel of the Special Court, subject to an appropriate mandate by the Security Council and within its capabilities.

2888

5515

Article 16
Cooperation with the Special Court

1. The Government shall cooperate with all organs of the Special Court at all stages of the proceedings. It shall, in particular, facilitate access to the Prosecutor to sites, persons and relevant documents required for the investigation.

2. The Government shall comply without undue delay with any request for assistance by the Special Court or an order issued by the Chambers, including, but not limited to:

(a) Identification and location of persons;

(b) Service of documents;

(c) Arrest or detention of persons;

(d) Transfer of an indictee to the Court.

Article 17
Working language

The official working language of the Special Court shall be English.

Article 18
Practical arrangements

1. With a view to achieving efficiency and cost-effectiveness in the operation of the Special Court, a phased-in approach shall be adopted for its establishment in accordance with the chronological order of the legal process.

2. In the first phase of the operation of the Special Court, judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar will be appointed along with investigative and prosecutorial staff. The process of investigations and prosecutions and the trial process of those already in custody shall then be initiated. While the judges of the Appeals Chamber shall serve whenever the Appeals Chamber is seized of a matter, they shall take office shortly before the trial process has been completed.

Article 19
Settlement of disputes

Any dispute between the Parties concerning the interpretation or application of this Agreement shall be settled by negotiation, or by any other mutually agreed-upon mode of settlement.

Article 20
Entry into force

The present Agreement shall enter into force on the day after both Parties have notified each other in writing that the legal instruments for entry into force have been complied with.

DONE at [place] on [day, month] 2000 in two copies in the English language.

For the United Nations

For the Government of Sierra Leone

2889

5516

Enclosure

Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone

Having been established by an Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone pursuant to Security Council resolution 1315 (2000) of 14 August 2000, the Special Court for Sierra Leone (hereinafter "the Special Court") shall function in accordance with the provisions of the present Statute.

Article 1
Competence of the Special Court

The Special Court shall have the power to prosecute persons most responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law committed in the territory of Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996.

Article 2
Crimes against humanity

The Special Court shall have the power to prosecute persons who committed the following crimes as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population:

(a) Murder;

(b) Extermination;

(c) Enslavement;

(d) Deportation;

(e) Imprisonment;

(f) Torture;

(g) Rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy and any other form of sexual violence;

(h) Persecution on political, racial, ethnic or religious grounds;

(i) Other inhumane acts.

Article 3
Violations of article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II

The Special Court shall have the power to prosecute persons who committed or ordered the commission of serious violations of article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the Protection of War Victims, and of Additional Protocol II thereto of 8 June 1977. These violations shall include:

(a) Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment;

(b) Collective punishments;

(c) Taking of hostages;

2890

(d) Acts of terrorism;

(e) Outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault;

(f) Pillage;

(g) The passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgement pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples;

(h) Threats to commit any of the foregoing acts.

Article 4
Other serious violations of international humanitarian law

The Special Court shall have the power to prosecute persons who committed the following serious violations of international humanitarian law:

(a) Intentionally directing attacks against the civilian population as such or against individual civilians not taking direct part in hostilities;

(b) Intentionally directing attacks against personnel, installations, material, units or vehicles involved in a humanitarian assistance or peacekeeping mission in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, as long as they are entitled to the protection given to civilians or civilian objects under the international law of armed conflict;

(c) Abduction and forced recruitment of children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups for the purpose of using them to participate actively in hostilities.

Article 5
Crimes under Sierra Leonean law

The Special Court shall have the power to prosecute persons who have committed the following crimes under Sierra Leonean law:

(a) Offences relating to the abuse of girls under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1926 (Cap. 31):

(i) Abusing a girl under 13 years of age, contrary to section 6;

(ii) Abusing a girl between 13 and 14 years of age, contrary to section 7;

(iii) Abduction of a girl for immoral purposes, contrary to section 12.

(b) Offences relating to the wanton destruction of property under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861:

(i) Setting fire to dwelling-houses, any person being therein to section 2;

(ii) Setting fire to public buildings, contrary to sections 5 and 6;

(iii) Setting fire to other buildings, contrary to section 6.

Article 6
Individual criminal responsibility

1. A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall be individually responsible for the crime.

2. The official position of any accused persons, whether as Head of State or Government or as a responsible government official, shall not relieve such person of criminal responsibility nor mitigate punishment.

3. The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior had failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

4. The fact that an accused person acted pursuant to an order of a Government or of a superior shall not relieve him or her of criminal responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if the Special Court determines that justice so requires.

5. Individual criminal responsibility for the crimes referred to in article 5 shall be determined in accordance with the respective laws of Sierra Leone.

Article 7
Jurisdiction over persons of 15 years of age

1. The Special Court shall have jurisdiction over persons who were 15 years of age at the time of the alleged commission of the crime.

2. At all stages of the proceedings, including investigation, prosecution and adjudication, an accused below the age of 18 (hereinafter "a juvenile offender") shall be treated with dignity and a sense of worth, taking into account his or her young age and the desirability of promoting his or her rehabilitation, reintegration into and assumption of a constructive role in society.

3. In a trial of a juvenile offender, the Special Court shall:

(a) Consider, as a priority, the release of the juvenile, unless his or her safety and security requires that the juvenile offender be placed under close supervision or in a remand home; detention pending trial shall be used as a measure of last resort;

(b) Constitute a "Juvenile Chamber" composed of at least one sitting judge and one alternate judge possessing the required qualifications and experience in juvenile justice;

(c) Order the separation of his or her trial, if jointly accused with adults;

(d) Provide the juvenile with the legal, social and any other assistance in the preparation and presentation of his or her defence, including the participation in legal proceedings of the juvenile offender's parent or legal guardian;

(e) Provide protective measures to ensure the privacy of the juvenile; such measures shall include, but not be limited to, the protection of the juvenile's identity, or the conduct of in camera proceedings;

5519

(f) In the disposition of his or her case, order any of the following: care guidance and supervision orders, community service orders, counselling, foster care, correctional, educational and vocational training programmes, approved schools and, as appropriate, any programmes of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration or programmes of child protection agencies.

Article 8
Concurrent jurisdiction

1. The Special Court and the national courts of Sierra Leone shall have concurrent jurisdiction.

2. The Special Court shall have primacy over the national courts of Sierra Leone. At any stage of the procedure, the Special Court may formally request a national court to defer to its competence in accordance with the present Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

Article 9
Non bis in idem

1. No person shall be tried before a national court of Sierra Leone for acts for which he or she has already been tried by the Special Court.

2. A person who has been tried by a national court for the acts referred to in articles 2 and 4 of the present Statute may be subsequently tried by the Special Court if:

(a) The act for which he or she was tried was characterized as an ordinary crime; or

(b) The national court proceedings were not impartial or independent, were designed to shield the accused from international criminal responsibility or the case was not diligently prosecuted.

3. In considering the penalty to be imposed on a person convicted of a crime under the present Statute, the Special Court shall take into account the extent to which any penalty imposed by a national court on the same person for the same act has already been served.

Article 10
Amnesty

An amnesty granted to any person falling within the jurisdiction of the Special Court in respect of the crimes referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall not be a bar to prosecution.

Article 11
Organization of the Special Court

The Special Court shall consist of the following organs:

(a) The Chambers, comprising two Trial Chambers and an Appeals Chamber;

(b) The Prosecutor; and

(c) The Registry.

2893

5520

Article 12
Composition of the Chambers

1. The Chambers shall be composed of eleven independent judges, who shall serve as follows:

(a) Three judges shall serve in each of the Trial Chambers, of whom one shall be a judge appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone, and two judges appointed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations (hereinafter "the Secretary-General");

(b) Five judges shall serve in the Appeals Chamber, of whom two shall be judges appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone, and three judges appointed by the Secretary-General.

2. Each judge shall serve only in the Chamber to which he or she has been appointed.

3. The judges of the Appeals Chamber and the judges of the Trial Chambers, respectively, shall elect a presiding judge who shall conduct the proceedings in the Chamber to which he or she was elected. The presiding judge of the Appeals Chamber shall be the President of the Special Court.

4. In addition to the judges sitting in the Chambers and present at every stage of the proceedings, the presiding judge of a Trial Chamber or the Appeals Chamber shall designate an alternate judge appointed by either the Government of Sierra Leone or the Secretary-General, to be present at each stage of the trial, and to replace a judge, if that judge is unable to continue sitting.

Article 13
Qualification and appointment of judges

1. The judges shall be persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices. They shall be independent in the performance of their functions, and shall not accept or seek instructions from any Government or any other source.

2. In the overall composition of the Chambers, due account shall be taken of the experience of the judges in international law, including international humanitarian law and human rights law, criminal law and juvenile justice.

3. The judges shall be appointed for a four-year period and shall be eligible for reappointment.

Article 14
Rules of Procedure and Evidence

1. The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda obtaining at the time of the establishment of the Special Court shall be applicable mutatis mutandis to the conduct of the legal proceedings before the Special Court.

2. The judges of the Special Court as a whole may amend the Rules of Procedure and Evidence or adopt additional rules where the applicable Rules do not, or do not adequately, provide for a specific situation. In so doing, they may be guided, as appropriate, by the Criminal Procedure Act, 1965, of Sierra Leone.

2894

5521

Article 15
The Prosecutor

1. The Prosecutor shall be responsible for the investigation and prosecution of persons most responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law and crimes under Sierra Leonean law committed in the territory of Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996. The Prosecutor shall act independently as a separate organ of the Special Court. He or she shall not seek or receive instructions from any Government or from any other source.

2. The Office of the Prosecutor shall have the power to question suspects, victims and witnesses, to collect evidence and to conduct on-site investigations. In carrying out these tasks, the Prosecutor shall, as appropriate, be assisted by the Sierra Leonean authorities concerned.

3. The Prosecutor shall be appointed by the Secretary-General for a four-year term and shall be eligible for reappointment. He or she shall be of high moral character and possess the highest level of professional competence and have extensive experience in the conduct of investigations and prosecution of criminal cases.

4. The Prosecutor shall be assisted by a Sierra Leonean Deputy Prosecutor, and by such other Sierra Leonean and international staff as may be required to perform the functions assigned to him or her effectively and efficiently. Given the nature of the crimes committed and the particular sensitivities of girls, young women and children victims of rape, sexual assault, abduction and slavery of all kinds, due consideration should be given in the appointment of staff to the employment of prosecutors and investigators experienced in gender-related crimes and juvenile justice.

5. In the prosecution of juvenile offenders, the Prosecutor shall ensure that the child-rehabilitation programme is not placed at risk and that, where appropriate, resort should be had to alternative truth and reconciliation mechanisms, to the extent of their availability.

Article 16
The Registry

1. The Registry shall be responsible for the administration and servicing of the Special Court.

2. The Registry shall consist of a Registrar and such other staff as may be required.

3. The Registrar shall be appointed by the Secretary-General after consultation with the President of the Special Court and shall be a staff member of the United Nations. He or she shall serve for a four-year term and be eligible for reappointment.

4. The Registrar shall set up a Victims and Witnesses Unit within the Registry. This Unit shall provide, in consultation with the Office of the Prosecutor, protective measures and security arrangements, counselling and other appropriate assistance for witnesses, victims who appear before the Court and others who are at risk on account of testimony given by such witnesses. The Unit personnel shall include experts in trauma, including trauma related to crimes of sexual violence and violence against children.

2895

Article 17
Rights of the accused

1. All accused shall be equal before the Special Court.

2. The accused shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing, subject to measures ordered by the Special Court for the protection of victims and witnesses.

3. The accused shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to the provisions of the present Statute.

4. In the determination of any charge against the accused pursuant to the present Statute, he or she shall be entitled to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality:

(a) To be informed promptly and in detail in a language which he or she understands of the nature and cause of the charge against him or her;

(b) To have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his or her defence and to communicate with counsel of his or her own choosing;

(c) To be tried without undue delay;

(d) To be tried in his or her presence, and to defend himself or herself in person or through legal assistance of his or her own choosing; to be informed, if he or she does not have legal assistance, of this right; and to have legal assistance assigned to him or her, in any case where the interests of justice so require, and without payment by him or her in any such case if he or she does not have sufficient means to pay for it;

(e) To examine, or have examined, the witnesses against him or her and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his or her behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him or her;

(f) To have the free assistance of an interpreter if he or she cannot understand or speak the language used in the Special Court;

(g) Not to be compelled to testify against himself or herself or to confess guilt.

Article 18
Judgement

The judgement shall be rendered by a majority of the judges of the Trial Chamber or of the Appeals Chamber, and shall be delivered in public. It shall be accompanied by a reasoned opinion in writing, to which separate or dissenting opinions may be appended.

5523

Article 19
Penalties

1. The Trial Chamber shall impose upon a convicted person, other than a juvenile offender, imprisonment for a specified number of years. In determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chamber shall, as appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the national courts of Sierra Leone.

2. In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chamber should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.

3. In addition to imprisonment, the Trial Chamber may order the forfeiture of the property, proceeds and any assets acquired unlawfully or by criminal conduct, and their return to their rightful owner or to the State of Sierra Leone.

Article 20
Appellate proceedings

1. The Appeals Chamber shall hear appeals from persons convicted by a Trial Chamber or from the Prosecutor on the following grounds:

(a) A procedural error;

(b) An error on a question of law invalidating the decision;

(c) An error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice.

2. The Appeals Chamber may affirm, reverse or revise the decisions taken by the Trial Chamber.

3. The judges of the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court shall be guided by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda. In the interpretation and application of the laws of Sierra Leone, they shall be guided by the decisions of the Supreme Court of Sierra Leone.

Article 21
Review proceedings

1. Where a new fact has been discovered which was not known at the time of the proceedings before the Trial Chamber or the Appeals Chamber and which could have been a decisive factor in reaching the decision, the convicted person or the Prosecutor may submit an application for review of the judgement.

2. An application for review shall be submitted to the Appeals Chamber. The Appeals Chamber may reject the application if it considers it to be unfounded. If it determines that the application is meritorious, it may, as appropriate:

(a) Reconvene the Trial Chamber;

(b) Retain jurisdiction over the matter.

2897

5524

Article 22
Enforcement of sentences

1. Imprisonment shall be served in Sierra Leone. If circumstances so require, imprisonment may also be served in any of the States which have concluded with the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda or the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia an agreement for the enforcement of sentences, and which have indicated to the Registrar of the Special Court their willingness to accept convicted persons. The Special Court may conclude similar agreements for the enforcement of sentences with other States.

2. Conditions of imprisonment, whether in Sierra Leone or in a third State, shall be governed by the law of the State of enforcement subject to the supervision of the Special Court. The State of enforcement shall be bound by the duration of the sentence, subject to article 23 of the present Statute.

Article 23
Pardon or commutation of sentences

If, pursuant to the applicable law of the State in which the convicted person is imprisoned, he or she is eligible for pardon or commutation of sentence, the State concerned shall notify the Special Court accordingly. There shall only be pardon or commutation of sentence if the President of the Special Court, in consultation with the judges, so decides on the basis of the interests of justice and the general principles of law.

Article 24
Working language

The working language of the Special Court shall be English.

Article 25
Annual report

The President of the Special Court shall submit an annual report on the operation and activities of the Court to the Secretary-General and to the Government of Sierra Leone.

2898

5525

S

UNITED NATIONS

Security Council

Distr.
GENERAL

S/25704
3 May 1993

ORIGINAL: ENGLISH

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL PURSUANT TO PARAGRAPH 2 OF SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 808 (1993)

CONTENTS

	Paragraphs	Page
Introduction	1 - 17	3
I. THE LEGAL BASIS FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNAL	18 - 30	6
II. COMPETENCE OF THE INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNAL	31 - 68	9
A. Competence ratione materiae (subject-matter jurisdiction)	33 - 49	9
B. Competence ratione personae (personal jurisdiction) and individual criminal responsibility	50 - 59	14
C. Competence ratione loci (territorial jurisdiction) and ratione temporis (temporal jurisdiction)	60 - 63	16
D. Concurrent jurisdiction and the principle of non-bis-in-idem	64 - 68	16
III. THE ORGANIZATION OF THE INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNAL	69 - 92	18
A. The Chambers	72 - 84	18
1. Composition of the Chambers	72 - 73	18
2. Qualifications and election of judges	74 - 78	19
3. Officers and members of the Chambers	79 - 82	21
4. Rules of procedure and evidence	83 - 84	21

93-24835 (E) 040593

/...

040593

2899

CONTENTS (continued)

		Paragraphs	Page
	B. The Prosecutor	85 - 89	22
	C. The Registry	90 - 92	23
IV.	INVESTIGATION AND PRE-TRIAL PROCEEDINGS	93 - 98	24
V.	TRIAL AND POST-TRIAL PROCEEDINGS	99 - 124	25
	A. Commencement and conduct of trial proceedings	99 - 105	25
	B. Rights of the accused	106 - 107	27
	C. Protection of victims and witnesses	108 - 109	28
	D. Judgement and penalties	110 - 115	28
	E. Appellate and review proceedings	116 - 120	29
	F. Enforcement of sentences	121 - 124	30
VI.	COOPERATION AND JUDICIAL ASSISTANCE	125 - 127	31
VII.	GENERAL PROVISIONS	128 - 138	32
	A. The status, privileges and immunities of the International Tribunal	128 - 130	32
	B. Seat of the International Tribunal	131 - 132	33
	C. Financial arrangements	133 - 134	33
	D. Working languages	135 - 136	34
	E. Annual report	137 - 138	34
Annex.	Statute of the International Tribunal		36

II. COMPETENCE OF THE INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNAL

31. The competence of the International Tribunal derives from the mandate set out in paragraph 1 of resolution 808 (1993). This part of the report will examine and make proposals regarding these fundamental elements of its competence: ratione materiae (subject-matter jurisdiction), ratione personae (personal jurisdiction), ratione loci (territorial jurisdiction) and ratione temporis (temporal jurisdiction), as well as the question of the concurrent jurisdiction of the International Tribunal and national courts.

32. The statute should begin with a general article on the competence of the International Tribunal which would read as follows:

Article 1

Competence of the International Tribunal

The International Tribunal shall have the power to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991 in accordance with the provisions of the present Statute.

A. Competence ratione materiae (subject-matter jurisdiction)

33. According to paragraph 1 of resolution 808 (1993), the international tribunal shall prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991. This body of law exists in the form of both conventional law and customary law. While there is international customary law which is not laid down in conventions, some of the major conventional humanitarian law has become part of customary international law.

34. In the view of the Secretary-General, the application of the principle nullum crimen sine lege requires that the international tribunal should apply rules of international humanitarian law which are beyond any doubt part of customary law so that the problem of adherence of some but not all States to specific conventions does not arise. This would appear to be particularly important in the context of an international tribunal prosecuting persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law.

35. The part of conventional international humanitarian law which has beyond doubt become part of international customary law is the law applicable in armed conflict as embodied in: the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the Protection of War Victims; 3/ the Hague Convention (IV) Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land and the Regulations annexed thereto of 18 October 1907; 4/ the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide of 9 December 1948; 5/ and the Charter of the International Military Tribunal of 8 August 1945. 6/

36. Suggestions have been made that the international tribunal should apply domestic law in so far as it incorporates customary international humanitarian

5528

ST/SGB/2012/1

Staff Regulations

United Nations • New York, 2012

2902

5529

2903

5530

ST/SGB/2012/1
20 March 2012

Secretary-General's Bulletin

Staff Regulations

The Secretary-General promulgates the following with respect to the Staff Regulations of the United Nations, established by the General Assembly in accordance with Article 101 of the Charter of the United Nations:

Section 1
Revised edition of the Staff Regulations

1.1 By its resolution 66/234, the General Assembly decided to amend staff regulation 1.2 (m) to define a conflict of interest and require the disclosure of actual or possible conflicts.

1.2 The revised text of the Staff Regulations incorporating the amendments referred to above is attached to the present bulletin.

1.3 Provisions of the Charter relating to service of the staff are set out on page v. Earlier amendments to the Staff Regulations are set out on page vi.

Section 2
Final provisions

2.1 The revised Staff Regulations are effective from 1 January 2012.

2.2 The present bulletin abolishes Secretary-General's bulletin ST/SGB/2009/6.

(Signed) BAN Ki-moon

2904

5531

2905

5532

Charter of the United Nations

Provisions relating to service of the staff

Article 8

The United Nations shall place no restrictions on the eligibility of men and women to participate in any capacity and under conditions of equality in its principal and subsidiary organs.

Article 97

The Secretariat shall comprise a Secretary-General and such staff as the Organization may require. The Secretary-General shall be appointed by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council. He shall be the chief administrative officer of the Organization.

Article 100

1. In the performance of their duties, the Secretary-General and the staff shall not seek or receive instructions from any Government or from any other authority external to the Organization. They shall refrain from any action which might reflect on their position as international officials responsible only to the Organization.

2. Each Member of the United Nations undertakes to respect the exclusively international character of the responsibilities of the Secretary-General and the staff and not to seek to influence them in the discharge of their responsibilities.

Article 101

1. The staff shall be appointed by the Secretary-General under regulations established by the General Assembly.

2. Appropriate staffs shall be permanently assigned to the Economic and Social Council, the Trusteeship Council, and, as required, to other organs of the United Nations. These staffs shall form a part of the Secretariat.

3. The paramount consideration in the employment of the staff and in the determination of the conditions of service shall be the necessity of securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity. Due regard shall be paid to the importance of recruiting the staff on as wide a geographical basis as possible.

Article 105

1. The Organization shall enjoy in the territory of each of its Members such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the fulfilment of its purposes.

2. Representatives of the Members of the United Nations and officials of the Organization shall similarly enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the Organization.

2906

5533

3. The General Assembly may make recommendations with a view to determining the details of the application of paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article or may propose conventions to the Members of the United Nations for this purpose.

Earlier amendments to the Staff Regulations

The General Assembly established the Staff Regulations of the United Nations according to Article 101 of the Charter by resolution 590 (VI) of 2 February 1952 and amended them thereafter by resolutions 781 (VIII) and 782 (VIII) of 9 December 1953, resolution 882 (IX) of 14 December 1954, resolution 887 (IX) of 17 December 1954, resolution 974 (X) of 15 December 1955, resolution 1095 (XI) of 27 February 1957, resolutions 1225 (XII) and 1234 (XII) of 14 December 1957, resolution 1295 (XIII) of 5 December 1958, resolution 1658 (XVI) of 28 November 1961, resolution 1730 (XVI) of 20 December 1961, resolution 1929 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963, resolution 2050 (XX) of 13 December 1965, resolution 2121 (XX) of 21 December 1965, resolution 2369 (XXII) of 19 December 1967, resolutions 2481 (XXIII) and 2485 (XXIII) of 21 December 1968, resolution 2742 (XXV) of 17 December 1970, resolution 2888 (XXVI) of 21 December 1971, resolution 2990 (XXVII) of 15 December 1972, resolution 3008 (XXVII) of 18 December 1972, resolution 3194 (XXVIII) of 18 December 1973, resolutions 3353 (XXIX) and 3358 B (XXIX) of 18 December 1974, resolution 31/141 B of 17 December 1976, resolution 32/200 and decision 32/450 B of 21 December 1977, resolution 33/119 of 19 December 1978, decision 33/433 of 20 December 1978, resolution 35/214 of 17 December 1980, decision 36/459 of 18 December 1981, resolution 37/126 of 17 December 1982, resolution 37/235 C of 21 December 1982, resolution 39/69 of 13 December 1984, resolutions 39/236 and 39/245 of 18 December 1984, decision 40/467 of 18 December 1985, resolutions 41/207 and 41/209 of 11 December 1986, resolutions 42/221 and 42/225 of 21 December 1987, resolution 43/226 of 21 December 1988, resolution 44/185 of 19 December 1989, resolution 44/198 of 21 December 1989, resolutions 45/241 and 45/251 of 21 December 1990, resolution 45/259 of 3 May 1991, resolution 46/191 of 20 December 1991, resolution 47/216 of 12 March 1993, resolution 47/226 of 30 April 1993, resolutions 48/224 and 48/225 of 23 December 1993, resolutions 49/222 and 49/223 of 23 December 1994, resolution 49/241 of 6 April 1995, resolution 51/216 of 18 December 1996, resolution 52/216 of 22 December 1997, resolution 52/225 of 4 February 1998, resolution 52/252 of 8 September 1998, resolution 54/238 and decision 54/460 of 23 December 1999, resolution 55/223 of 23 December 2000, resolution 55/258 of 14 June 2001, resolution 56/244 of 24 December 2001, resolution 57/285 of 20 December 2002, resolution 57/310 of 18 June 2003, resolution 58/265 of 23 December 2003, resolution 59/268 of 23 December 2004, resolutions 60/238 and 60/248 of 23 December 2005, resolution 61/239 of 22 December 2006, resolution 62/227 of 22 December 2007, resolution 63/271 of 7 April 2009 and resolution 66/234 of 24 December 2011.

2907

5534

Staff Regulations of the United Nations

Contents

Article		Page
	Scope and purpose	1
I.	Duties, obligations and privileges	1
II.	Classification of posts and staff	4
III.	Salaries and related allowances	5
IV.	Appointment and promotion	8
V.	Annual and special leave	10
VI.	Social security	10
VII.	Travel and removal expenses	10
VIII.	Staff relations	11
IX.	Separation from service	11
X.	Disciplinary measures	12
XI.	Appeals	13
XII.	General provisions	13
Annexes
I.	Salary scales and related provisions	14
II.	Letters of appointment	17
III.	Termination indemnity	18
IV.	Repatriation grant	20

2908

5535

Staff Regulations of the United Nations

Scope and purpose

The Staff Regulations embody the fundamental conditions of service and the basic rights, duties and obligations of the United Nations Secretariat. They represent the broad principles of human resources policy for the staffing and administration of the Secretariat. For the purposes of these Regulations, the expressions "United Nations Secretariat", "staff members" or "staff" shall refer to all the staff members of the Secretariat, within the meaning of Article 97 of the Charter of the United Nations, whose employment and contractual relationship are defined by a letter of appointment subject to regulations promulgated by the General Assembly pursuant to Article 101, paragraph 1, of the Charter. The Secretary-General, as the chief administrative officer, shall provide and enforce such staff rules consistent with these principles as he or she considers necessary.

Article I
Duties, obligations and privileges

Regulation 1.1
Status of staff

(a) Staff members are international civil servants. Their responsibilities as staff members are not national but exclusively international;

(b) Staff members shall make the following written declaration witnessed by the Secretary-General or his or her authorized representative:

> "I solemnly declare and promise to exercise in all loyalty, discretion and conscience the functions entrusted to me as an international civil servant of the United Nations, to discharge these functions and regulate my conduct with the interests of the United Nations only in view, and not to seek or accept instructions in regard to the performance of my duties from any Government or other source external to the Organization.
>
> "I also solemnly declare and promise to respect the obligations incumbent upon me as set out in the Staff Regulations and Rules."

(c) The Secretary-General shall ensure that the rights and duties of staff members, as set out in the Charter and the Staff Regulations and Rules and in the relevant resolutions and decisions of the General Assembly, are respected;

(d) The Secretary-General shall seek to ensure that the paramount consideration in the determination of the conditions of service shall be the necessity of securing staff of the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity;

(e) The Staff Regulations apply to all staff at all levels, including staff of the separately funded organs, holding appointments under the Staff Rules;

(f) The privileges and immunities enjoyed by the United Nations by virtue of Article 105 of the Charter are conferred in the interests of the Organization. These privileges and immunities furnish no excuse to the staff members who are covered by them to fail to observe laws and police regulations of the State in which they are located, nor do they furnish an excuse for non-performance of their private obligations. In any case where an issue arises regarding the application of these privileges and immunities, the staff member shall immediately report the matter to the Secretary-General, who alone may decide whether such privileges and immunities exist and whether they shall be waived in accordance with the relevant instruments.

2909

5536

Regulation 1.2
Basic rights and obligations of staff

Core values

(a) Staff members shall uphold and respect the principles set out in the Charter, including faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women. Consequently, staff members shall exhibit respect for all cultures; they shall not discriminate against any individual or group of individuals or otherwise abuse the power and authority vested in them;

(b) Staff members shall uphold the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity. The concept of integrity includes, but is not limited to, probity, impartiality, fairness, honesty and truthfulness in all matters affecting their work and status;

General rights and obligations

(c) Staff members are subject to the authority of the Secretary-General and to assignment by him or her to any of the activities or offices of the United Nations. In exercising this authority the Secretary-General shall seek to ensure, having regard to the circumstances, that all necessary safety and security arrangements are made for staff carrying out the responsibilities entrusted to them;

(d) In the performance of their duties staff members shall neither seek nor accept instructions from any Government or from any other source external to the Organization;

(e) By accepting appointment, staff members pledge themselves to discharge their functions and regulate their conduct with the interests of the Organization only in view. Loyalty to the aims, principles and purposes of the United Nations, as set forth in its Charter, is a fundamental obligation of all staff members by virtue of their status as international civil servants;

(f) While staff members' personal views and convictions, including their political and religious convictions, remain inviolable, staff members shall ensure that those views and convictions do not adversely affect their official duties or the interests of the United Nations. They shall conduct themselves at all times in a manner befitting their status as international civil servants and shall not engage in any activity that is incompatible with the proper discharge of their duties with the United Nations. They shall avoid any action and, in particular, any kind of public pronouncement that may adversely reflect on their status, or on the integrity, independence and impartiality that are required by that status;

(g) Staff members shall not use their office or knowledge gained from their official functions for private gain, financial or otherwise, or for the private gain of any third party, including family, friends and those they favour. Nor shall staff members use their office for personal reasons to prejudice the positions of those they do not favour;

2910

5537

(h) Staff members may exercise the right to vote but shall ensure that their participation in any political activity is consistent with, and does not reflect adversely upon, the independence and impartiality required by their status as international civil servants;

(i) Staff members shall exercise the utmost discretion with regard to all matters of official business. They shall not communicate to any Government, entity, person or any other source any information known to them by reason of their official position that they know or ought to have known has not been made public, except as appropriate in the normal course of their duties or by authorization of the Secretary-General. These obligations do not cease upon separation from service;

Honours, gifts or remuneration

(j) No staff member shall accept any honour, decoration, favour, gift or remuneration from any Government;

(k) If refusal of an unanticipated honour, decoration, favour or gift from a Government would cause embarrassment to the Organization, the staff member may receive it on behalf of the Organization and then report and entrust it to the Secretary-General, who will either retain it for the Organization or arrange for its disposal for the benefit of the Organization or for a charitable purpose;

(l) No staff member shall accept any honour, decoration, favour, gift or remuneration from any non-governmental source without first obtaining the approval of the Secretary-General;

Conflict of interest

(m) A conflict of interest occurs when, by act or omission, a staff member's personal interests interfere with the performance of his or her official duties and responsibilities or with the integrity, independence and impartiality required by the staff member's status as an international civil servant. When an actual or possible conflict of interest does arise, the conflict shall be disclosed by staff members to their head of office, mitigated by the Organization and resolved in favour of the interests of the Organization;

(n) All staff members at the D-1 level and above shall be required to file financial disclosure statements on appointment and at intervals thereafter as prescribed by the Secretary-General, in respect of themselves, their spouses and their dependent children, and to assist the Secretary-General in verifying the accuracy of the information submitted when so requested. The financial disclosure statements shall include certification that the assets and economic activities of the staff members, their spouses and their dependent children do not pose a conflict of interest with their official duties or the interests of the United Nations. The financial disclosure statements will remain confidential and will only be used, as prescribed by the Secretary-General, in making determinations pursuant to staff regulation 1.2 (m). The Secretary-General may require other staff to file financial disclosure statements as he or she deems necessary in the interest of the Organization;

2911

5538

Outside employment and activities

(o) Staff members shall not engage in any outside occupation or employment, whether remunerated or not, without the approval of the Secretary-General;

(p) The Secretary-General may authorize staff members to engage in an outside occupation or employment, whether remunerated or not, if:

(i) The outside occupation or employment does not conflict with the staff member's official functions or the status of an international civil servant;

(ii) The outside occupation or employment is not against the interest of the United Nations; and

(iii) The outside occupation or employment is permitted by local law at the duty station or where the occupation or employment occurs;

Use of property and assets

(q) Staff members shall use the property and assets of the Organization only for official purposes and shall exercise reasonable care when utilizing such property and assets;

(r) Staff members must respond fully to requests for information from staff members and other officials of the Organization authorized to investigate the possible misuse of funds, waste or abuse.

Regulation 1.3
Performance of staff

(a) Staff members are accountable to the Secretary-General for the proper discharge of their functions. Staff members are required to uphold the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity in the discharge of their functions. Their performance will be appraised periodically to ensure that the required standards of performance are met;

(b) The whole time of staff members shall be at the disposal of the Secretary-General for the performance of official functions. The Secretary-General shall establish a normal working week and shall establish official holidays for each duty station. Exceptions may be made by the Secretary-General as the needs of the service may require, and staff members shall be required to work beyond the normal tour of duty when requested to do so.

Article II
Classification of posts and staff

Regulation 2.1

In conformity with principles laid down by the General Assembly, the Secretary-General shall make appropriate provision for the classification of posts and staff according to the nature of the duties and responsibilities required.

2912

5539

Article III
Salaries and related allowances

Regulation 3.1

Salaries of staff members shall be fixed by the Secretary-General in accordance with the provisions of annex I to the present Regulations.

Regulation 3.2

(a) The Secretary-General shall establish terms and conditions under which an education grant shall be available to a staff member residing and serving outside his or her recognized home country whose dependent child is in full-time attendance at a school, university or similar educational institution of a type that will, in the opinion of the Secretary-General, facilitate the child's reassimilation in the staff member's recognized home country. The grant shall be payable in respect of the child up to the end of the fourth year of post-secondary studies. The amount of the grant per scholastic year for each child shall be 75 per cent of the admissible educational expenses actually incurred, subject to a maximum grant as approved by the General Assembly. Travel costs of the child may also be paid for an outward and return journey once in each scholastic year between the educational institution and the duty station, except that in the case of staff members serving at designated duty stations where schools do not exist that provide schooling in the language or in the cultural tradition desired by staff members for their children, such travel costs may be paid twice in the year in which the staff member is not entitled to home leave. Such travel shall be by a route approved by the Secretary-General but not in an amount exceeding the cost of such a journey between the home country and the duty station;

(b) The Secretary-General shall also establish terms and conditions under which, at designated duty stations, an additional amount of 100 per cent of boarding costs subject to a maximum amount per year as approved by the General Assembly may be paid in respect of children in school attendance at the primary and secondary levels;

(c) The Secretary-General shall also establish terms and conditions under which an education grant shall be available to a staff member serving in a country whose language is different from his or her own and who is obliged to pay tuition for the teaching of the mother tongue to a dependent child attending a local school in which the instruction is given in a language other than his or her own;

(d) The Secretary-General shall also establish terms and conditions under which an education grant shall be available to a staff member whose child is unable, by reason of physical or mental disability, to attend a normal educational institution and therefore requires special teaching or training to prepare him or her for full integration into society or, while attending a normal educational institution, requires special teaching or training to assist him or her in overcoming the disability. The amount of this grant per year for each disabled child shall be equal to 100 per cent of the education expenses actually incurred, up to a maximum amount approved by the General Assembly;

(e) The Secretary-General may decide in each case whether the education grant shall extend to adopted children or stepchildren.

2913

Regulation 3.3

(a) An assessment at the rates and under the conditions specified below shall be applied to the salaries and such other emoluments of staff members as are computed on the basis of salary, excluding post adjustments, provided that the Secretary-General may, where he or she deems it advisable, exempt from the assessment the salaries and emoluments of staff members engaged at locality rates.

(b) (i) The assessment shall be calculated at the following rates for staff members whose salary rates are set forth in paragraphs 1 and 3 of annex I to the present Regulations:

Assessment

Total assessable payments (United States dollars)	Staff assessment rates for purposes of pensionable remuneration and pensions (percentage)
Up to 20,000 per year	11
20,001 to 40,000 per year	18
40,001 to 60,000 per year	25
60,001 and above per year	30

Staff assessment rates used in conjunction with gross base salaries (effective 1 January 2006)

A. Staff assessment rates for staff member with dependants

Assessable payments (United States dollars)	Staff assessment rates for those with a dependent spouse or dependent child (percentage)
First 50,000 per year	19
Next 50,000 per year	28
Next 50,000 per year	32
Remaining assessable payments	35

B. Staff assessment for staff members without dependants

Staff assessment amounts for those with neither a dependent spouse nor a dependent child would be equal to the differences between the gross salaries at different grades and steps and the corresponding net salaries at the single rate.

(ii) The assessment shall be calculated at the following rates for staff members whose salary rates are established under paragraph 6 of annex I to the present Regulations:

5541

Total assessable payments (United States dollars)	Assessment (percentage)
Up to 20,000 per year	19
20,001 to 40,000 per year	23
40,001 to 60,000 per year	26
60,001 and above per year	31

(iii) The Secretary-General shall determine which of the scales of assessment set out in subparagraphs (i) and (ii) above shall apply to each of the groups of personnel whose salary rates are established under paragraph 5 of annex I to the present Regulations;

(iv) In the case of staff members whose salary scales are established in currencies other than United States dollars, the relevant amounts to which the assessment applies shall be fixed at the local currency equivalent of the above-mentioned dollar amounts at the time the salary scales of the staff member concerned are approved;

(c) In the case of a person who is not employed by the United Nations for the whole of a calendar year or in cases where there is a change in the annual rate of payments made to a staff member, the rate of assessment shall be governed by the annual rate of each such payment made to him or her;

(d) The assessment computed under the foregoing provisions of the present regulation shall be collected by the United Nations by withholding it from payments. No part of the assessment so collected shall be refunded because of cessation of employment during the calendar year;

(e) Revenue derived from staff assessment not otherwise disposed of by specific resolution of the General Assembly shall be credited to the Tax Equalization Fund established by General Assembly resolution 973 A (X);

(f) Where a staff member is subject both to staff assessment under this plan and to national income taxation in respect of the salaries and emoluments paid to him or her by the United Nations, the Secretary-General is authorized to refund to him or her the amount of staff assessment collected from him or her provided that:

(i) The amount of such refund shall in no case exceed the amount of his or her income taxes paid and payable in respect of his or her United Nations income;

(ii) If the amount of such income taxes exceeds the amount of staff assessment, the Secretary-General may also pay to the staff member the amount of such excess;

(iii) Payments made in accordance with the provisions of the present regulation shall be charged to the Tax Equalization Fund;

(iv) A payment under the conditions prescribed in the three preceding subparagraphs is authorized in respect of dependency benefits and post adjustments, which are not subject to staff assessment but may be subject to national income taxation.

2915

5542

Regulation 3.4

(a) Staff members whose salary rates are set forth in paragraphs 1 and 3 of annex I to the present Regulations shall be entitled to receive dependency allowances for a dependent child, for a disabled child and for a secondary dependant at rates approved by the General Assembly as follows:

(i) The staff member shall receive an allowance for each dependent child, except that the allowance shall not be paid in respect of the first dependent child if the staff member has no dependent spouse, in which case the staff member shall be entitled to the dependency rate of staff assessment under subparagraph (b) (i) of regulation 3.3;

(ii) The staff member shall receive a special allowance for each disabled child. However, if the staff member has no dependent spouse and is entitled to the dependency rate of staff assessment under subparagraph (b) (i) of regulation 3.3 in respect of a disabled child, the allowance shall be the same as the allowance for a dependent child in (i) above;

(iii) Where there is no dependent spouse, a single annual allowance shall be paid for a secondary dependant in respect of either a dependent parent, a dependent brother or a dependent sister;

(b) If both husband and wife are staff members, one may claim, for dependent children, under subparagraph (a) (i) and (ii) above, in which case the other may claim only under subparagraph (a) (iii) above, if otherwise entitled;

(c) With a view to avoiding duplication of benefits and in order to achieve equality between staff members who receive dependency benefits under applicable laws in the form of governmental grants and staff members who do not receive such dependency benefits, the Secretary-General shall prescribe conditions under which the dependency allowance for a child specified in subparagraph (a) (i) above shall be payable only to the extent that the dependency benefits enjoyed by the staff member or his or her spouse under applicable laws amount to less than such a dependency allowance;

(d) Staff members whose salary rates are set by the Secretary-General under paragraph 5 or paragraph 6 of annex I to the present Regulations shall be entitled to receive dependency allowances at rates and under conditions determined by the Secretary-General, due regard being given to the circumstances in the locality in which the office is located;

(e) Claims for dependency allowances shall be submitted in writing and supported by evidence satisfactory to the Secretary-General. A separate claim for dependency allowances shall be made each year.

Article IV
Appointment and promotion

Regulation 4.1

As stated in Article 101 of the Charter, the power of appointment of staff members rests with the Secretary-General. Upon appointment, each staff member, including a staff member on secondment from government service, shall receive a letter of appointment in accordance with the provisions of annex II to the present Regulations and signed by the Secretary-General or by an official in the name of the Secretary-General.

2916

5543

Regulation 4.2

The paramount consideration in the appointment, transfer or promotion of the staff shall be the necessity of securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity. Due regard shall be paid to the importance of recruiting the staff on as wide a geographical basis as possible.

Regulation 4.3

In accordance with the principles of the Charter, selection of staff members shall be made without distinction as to race, sex or religion. So far as practicable, selection shall be made on a competitive basis.

Regulation 4.4

Subject to the provisions of Article 101, paragraph 3, of the Charter, and without prejudice to the recruitment of fresh talent at all levels, the fullest regard shall be had, in filling vacancies, to the requisite qualifications and experience of persons already in the service of the United Nations. This consideration shall also apply, on a reciprocal basis, to the specialized agencies brought into relationship with the United Nations. The Secretary-General may limit eligibility to apply for vacant posts to internal candidates, as defined by the Secretary-General. If so, other candidates shall be allowed to apply, under conditions to be defined by the Secretary-General, when no internal candidate meets the requirements of Article 101, paragraph 3, of the Charter as well as the requirements of the post.

Regulation 4.5

(a) Appointment of Under-Secretaries-General and of Assistant Secretaries-General shall normally be for a period of up to five years, subject to prolongation or renewal. Other staff members shall be granted either a temporary, fixed-term or continuing appointment under such terms and conditions consistent with the present Regulations as the Secretary-General may prescribe;

(b) A temporary appointment does not carry any expectancy, legal or otherwise, of renewal. A temporary appointment shall not be converted to any other type of appointment;

(c) A fixed-term appointment does not carry any expectancy, legal or otherwise, of renewal or conversion, irrespective of the length of service;

(d) The Secretary-General shall prescribe which staff members are eligible for consideration for continuing appointments.

Regulation 4.6

The Secretary-General shall establish appropriate medical standards that staff members shall be required to meet before appointment.

2917

5544

Article V
Annual and special leave

Regulation 5.1

Staff members shall be allowed appropriate annual leave.

Regulation 5.2

Special leave may be authorized by the Secretary-General in exceptional cases.

Regulation 5.3

Eligible staff members shall be granted home leave once in every twenty-four months. However, in the case of designated duty stations having very difficult conditions of life and work, eligible staff members shall be granted home leave once in every twelve months. A staff member whose home country is either the country of his or her official duty station or the country of his or her normal residence while in United Nations service shall not be eligible for home leave.

Article VI
Social security

Regulation 6.1

Provision shall be made for the participation of staff members in the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund in accordance with the regulations of that Fund.

Regulation 6.2

The Secretary-General shall establish a scheme of social security for the staff, including provisions for health protection, sick leave, maternity and paternity leave, and reasonable compensation in the event of illness, accident or death attributable to the performance of official duties on behalf of the United Nations.

Article VII
Travel and removal expenses

Regulation 7.1

Subject to conditions and definitions prescribed by the Secretary-General, the United Nations shall, in appropriate cases, pay the travel expenses of staff members, their spouses and dependent children.

Regulation 7.2

Subject to conditions and definitions prescribed by the Secretary-General, the United Nations shall, in appropriate cases, pay removal costs for staff members.

2918

5545

Article VIII
Staff relations

Regulation 8.1

(a) The Secretary-General shall establish and maintain continuous contact and communication with the staff in order to ensure the effective participation of the staff in identifying, examining and resolving issues relating to staff welfare, including conditions of work, general conditions of life and other human resources policies;

(b) Staff representative bodies shall be established and shall be entitled to initiate proposals to the Secretary-General for the purpose set forth in paragraph (a) above. They shall be organized in such a way as to afford equitable representation to all staff members, by means of elections that shall take place at least biennially under electoral regulations drawn up by the respective staff representative body and agreed to by the Secretary-General.

Regulation 8.2

The Secretary-General shall establish joint staff-management machinery at both local and Secretariat-wide levels to advise him or her regarding human resources policies and general questions of staff welfare as provided in regulation 8.1.

Article IX
Separation from service

Regulation 9.1

Staff members may resign from service upon giving the Secretary-General the notice required under the terms of their appointment.

Regulation 9.2

Staff members shall not be retained in active service beyond the age of sixty years or, if appointed on or after 1 January 1990, beyond the age of sixty-two years. The Secretary-General may, in the interest of the Organization, extend this age limit in exceptional cases.

Regulation 9.3

(a) The Secretary-General may, giving the reasons therefor, terminate the appointment of a staff member who holds a temporary, fixed-term or continuing appointment in accordance with the terms of his or her appointment or for any of the following reasons:

(i) If the necessities of service require abolition of the post or reduction of the staff;

(ii) If the services of the staff member prove unsatisfactory;

(iii) If the staff member is, for reasons of health, incapacitated for further service;

2919

5546

(iv) If the conduct of the staff member indicates that the staff member does not meet the highest standards of integrity required by Article 101, paragraph 3, of the Charter;

(v) If facts anterior to the appointment of the staff member and relevant to his or her suitability come to light that, if they had been known at the time of his or her appointment, should, under the standards established in the Charter, have precluded his or her appointment;

(vi) In the interest of the good administration of the Organization and in accordance with the standards of the Charter, provided that the action is not contested by the staff member concerned;

(b) In addition, in the case of a staff member holding a continuing appointment, the Secretary-General may terminate the appointment without the consent of the staff member if, in the opinion of the Secretary-General, such action would be in the interest of the good administration of the Organization, to be interpreted principally as a change or termination of a mandate, and in accordance with the standards of the Charter;

(c) If the Secretary-General terminates an appointment, the staff member shall be given such notice and such indemnity payment as may be applicable under the Staff Regulations and Staff Rules. Payments of termination indemnity shall be made by the Secretary-General in accordance with the rates and conditions specified in annex III to the present Regulations;

(d) The Secretary-General may, where the circumstances warrant and he or she considers it justified, pay to a staff member whose appointment has been terminated, provided that the termination is not contested, a termination indemnity payment not more than 50 per cent higher than that which would otherwise be payable under the Staff Regulations.

Regulation 9.4

The Secretary-General shall establish a scheme for the payment of repatriation grants in accordance with the maximum rates and under the conditions specified in annex IV of these Regulations.

Article X
Disciplinary measures

Regulation 10.1

(a) The Secretary-General may impose disciplinary measures on staff members who engage in misconduct;

(b) Sexual exploitation and sexual abuse constitute serious misconduct.

2920

5547

Article XI Appeals

Regulation 11.1

There shall be a two-tier formal system of administration of justice:

(a) The United Nations Dispute Tribunal shall, under conditions prescribed in its statute and rules, hear and render judgement on an application from a staff member alleging non-compliance with his or her terms of appointment or the contract of employment, including all pertinent regulations and rules;

(b) The United Nations Appeals Tribunal shall, under conditions prescribed in its statute and rules, exercise appellate jurisdiction over an appeal of a judgement rendered by the United Nations Dispute Tribunal submitted by either party.

Article XII
General provisions

Regulation 12.1

The present Regulations may be supplemented or amended by the General Assembly, without prejudice to the acquired rights of staff members.

Regulation 12.2

Such staff rules and amendments as the Secretary-General may make to implement the present Regulations shall be provisional until the requirements of regulations 12.3 and 12.4 below have been met.

Regulation 12.3

The full text of provisional staff rules and amendments shall be reported annually to the General Assembly. Should the Assembly find that a provisional rule and/or amendment is inconsistent with the intent and purpose of the Regulations, it may direct that the rule and/or amendment be withdrawn or modified.

Regulation 12.4

The provisional rules and amendments reported by the Secretary-General, taking into account such modifications and/or deletions as may be directed by the General Assembly, shall enter into full force and effect on 1 January following the year in which the report is made to the Assembly.

Regulation 12.5

Staff rules shall not give rise to acquired rights within the meaning of regulation 12.1 while they are provisional.

2921

5548

Annex I

Salary scales and related provisions

1. The Secretary-General shall establish the salary of the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme and the salaries of United Nations officials in the Director category and above, in accordance with amounts determined by the General Assembly, subject to the staff assessment plan provided in staff regulation 3.3 and to post adjustments wherever applied. If otherwise eligible, they shall receive the allowances that are available to staff members generally.

2. The Secretary-General is authorized, on the basis of appropriate justification and/or reporting, to make additional payments to United Nations officials in the Director category and above to compensate for such special costs as may be reasonably incurred, in the interests of the Organization, in the performance of duties assigned to them by the Secretary-General. Similar additional payments in similar circumstances may be made to heads of offices away from Headquarters. The maximum total amount of such payments is to be determined in the programme budget by the General Assembly.

3. Except as provided in paragraph 5 of the present annex, the salary scales and the scales of post adjustment for staff members in the Professional and higher categories shall be as shown in the present annex.

4. Subject to satisfactory service, salary increments within the levels set forth in paragraph 3 of the present annex shall be awarded annually, except that any increments above step XI of the Associate Officer level, step XIII of the Second Officer level, step XII of the First Officer level, step X of the Senior Officer level and step IV of the Principal Officer level shall be preceded by two years at the previous step. The Secretary-General is authorized to reduce the interval between salary increments to ten months and twenty months, respectively, in the case of staff subject to geographical distribution who have an adequate and confirmed knowledge of a second official language of the United Nations.

5. The Secretary-General shall determine the salary rates to be paid to personnel specifically engaged for short-term missions, conference and other short-term service, to consultants, to Field Service personnel and to technical assistance experts.

6. The Secretary-General shall fix the salary scales for staff members in the General Service and related categories, normally on the basis of the best prevailing conditions of employment in the locality of the United Nations Office concerned, provided that the Secretary-General may, where he or she deems it appropriate, establish rules and salary limits for payment of non-resident allowance to General Service staff members recruited from outside the local area. The gross pensionable remuneration of such staff shall be determined in accordance with the methodology specified in article 54 (a) of the Regulations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund and are shown in the salary scales applicable to such staff.

7. The Secretary-General shall establish rules under which a language allowance may be paid to staff members in the General Service category who pass an appropriate test and demonstrate continued proficiency in the use of two or more official languages.

2922

5549

8. In order to preserve equivalent standards of living at different offices, the Secretary-General may adjust the basic salaries set forth in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the present annex by the application of non-pensionable post adjustments based on relative costs of living, standards of living and related factors at the office concerned as compared to New York. Such post adjustments shall not be subject to staff assessment.

9. No salary shall be paid to staff members in respect of periods of unauthorized absence from work unless such absence was caused by reasons beyond their control or duly certified medical reasons.

2923

Salary scale for staff in the Professional and higher categories showing annual gross salaries and net equivalents after application of staff assessment

Effective 1 January 2012

(United States dollars)

Level		STEPS I	II	III	IV	V	VI	VII	VIII	IX	X	XI	XII	XIII	XIV	XV
USG	Gross	189 349
	Net D	146 044
	Net S	131 432
ASG	Gross	172 071
	Net D	133 950
	Net S	121 297
			*	*	*	*	*
D-2	Gross	141 227	144 223	147 221	150 227	153 351	156 476
	Net D	112 096	114 283	116 471	118 659	120 846	123 033
	Net S	102 981	104 827	106 666	108 500	110 329	112 147
						*	*	*	*	*
D-1	Gross	129 047	131 678	134 304	136 936	139 568	142 197	144 830	147 459	150 093
	Net D	103 204	105 125	107 042	108 963	110 885	112 804	114 726	116 645	118 565
	Net S	95 394	97 062	98 728	100 388	102 047	103 702	105 349	106 996	108 638
												*	*	*
P-5	Gross	106 718	108 955	111 195	113 430	115 670	117 905	120 147	122 384	124 622	126 860	129 099	131 336	133 575
	Net D	86 904	88 537	90 172	91 804	93 439	95 071	96 707	98 340	99 974	101 608	103 242	104 875	106 510
	Net S	80 734	82 186	83 633	85 079	86 524	87 963	89 402	90 838	92 272	93 703	95 132	96 556	97 981
														*	*	*
P-4	Gross	87 933	89 929	91 924	93 919	95 916	97 910	99 908	102 059	104 219	106 377	108 540	110 696	112 856	115 018	117 178
	Net D	72 467	74 044	75 620	77 196	78 774	80 349	81 927	83 503	85 080	86 655	88 234	89 808	91 385	92 963	94 540
	Net S	67 483	68 918	70 354	71 784	73 215	74 645	76 074	77 500	78 924	80 349	81 770	83 191	84 612	86 030	87 447
															*	*
P-3	Gross	72 267	74 114	75 962	77 808	79 657	81 503	83 348	85 199	87 046	88 892	90 742	92 586	94 437	96 282	98 128
	Net D	60 091	61 550	63 010	64 468	65 929	67 387	68 845	70 307	71 766	73 225	74 686	76 143	77 605	79 063	80 521
	Net S	56 091	57 433	58 777	60 118	61 462	62 803	64 143	65 488	66 828	68 170	69 508	70 847	72 182	73 521	74 859
													*
P-2	Gross	59 267	60 920	62 571	64 225	65 877	67 528	69 182	70 832	72 485	74 139	75 790	77 443
	Net D	49 821	51 127	52 431	53 738	55 043	56 347	57 654	58 957	60 263	61 570	62 874	64 180
	Net S	46 730	47 915	49 096	50 279	51 461	52 645	53 847	55 046	56 251	57 452	58 650	59 854
P-1	Gross	46 399	47 878	49 348	50 891	52 476	54 063	55 653	57 243	58 827	60 415
	Net D	39 439	40 696	41 946	43 204	44 456	45 710	46 966	48 222	49 473	50 728
	Net S	37 202	38 359	39 516	40 671	41 827	42 982	44 138	45 280	46 416	47 553

D = Rate applicable to staff members with a dependent spouse or child.
S = Rate applicable to staff members with no dependent spouse or child.
* = The normal qualifying period for in-grade movement between consecutive steps is one year, except at those steps marked with an asterisk, for which a two-year period at the preceding step is required.

2924

2555

5551

Annex II

Letters of appointment

(a) The letter of appointment shall state:

(i) That the appointment is subject to the provisions of the Staff Regulations and of the Staff Rules applicable to the category of appointment in question and to changes which may be duly made in such regulations and rules from time to time;

(ii) The nature of the appointment;

(iii) The date at which the staff member is required to enter upon his or her duties;

(iv) The period of appointment, the notice required to terminate it and the period of probation, if any;

(v) The category, level, commencing rate of salary and, if increments are allowable, the scale of increments, and the maximum attainable;

(vi) Any special conditions which may be applicable;

(vii) That a temporary appointment does not carry any expectancy, legal or otherwise, of renewal. A temporary appointment shall not be converted to any other type of appointment;

(viii) That a fixed-term appointment does not carry any expectancy, legal or otherwise, of renewal or conversion, irrespective of the length of service;

(b) A copy of the Staff Regulations and the Staff Rules shall be transmitted to the staff member with the letter of appointment. In accepting appointment the staff member shall state that he or she has been acquainted with and accepts the conditions laid down in the Staff Regulations and in the Staff Rules;

(c) The letter of appointment of a staff member on secondment from government service signed by the staff member and by or on behalf of the Secretary-General, and relevant supporting documentation of the terms and conditions of secondment agreed to by the Member State and the staff member, shall be evidence of the existence and validity of secondment from government service to the Organization for the period stated in the letter of appointment.

2925

5552

Annex III

Termination indemnity

Staff members whose appointments are terminated shall be paid an indemnity in accordance with the following provisions:

(a) Except as provided in paragraphs (b), (c), (d) and (e) below and in regulation 9.3, the termination indemnity shall be paid in accordance with the following schedule:

	Months of gross salary, less staff assessment, where applicable
Completed years of service	Temporary appointments exceeding six months	Fixed-term appointments	Continuing appointments
Less than 1	One week for each month of uncompleted service subject to a minimum of six weeks' and a maximum of three months' indemnity pay	One week for each month of uncompleted service subject to a minimum of six weeks' and a maximum of three months' indemnity pay	Not applicable
1			Not applicable
2			3
3			3
4			4
5			5
6		3	6
7		5	7
8		7	8
9	Not applicable	9	9
10		9.5	9.5
11		10	10
12		10.5	10.5
13		11	11
14		11.5	11.5
15 or more		12	12

(b) A staff member whose appointment is terminated for reasons of health shall receive an indemnity equal to the indemnity provided under paragraph (a) of the present annex reduced by the amount of any disability benefit that the staff member may receive under the Regulations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund for the number of months to which the indemnity rate corresponds;

(c) A staff member whose appointment is terminated for unsatisfactory service or who for disciplinary reasons is separated from service for misconduct other than by dismissal may be paid, at the discretion of the Secretary-General, an indemnity not exceeding one half of the indemnity provided under paragraph (a) of the present annex;

2926

5553

(d) No indemnity payments shall be made to:

(i) A staff member who resigns, except where termination notice has been given and the termination date agreed upon;

(ii) A staff member who has a temporary or a fixed-term appointment that is completed on the expiration date specified in the letter of appointment;

(iii) A staff member who is dismissed;

(iv) A staff member who abandons his or her post;

(v) A staff member who is retired under the Regulations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund;

(e) Personnel specifically engaged for conference and other short-term service, as consultants or as experts, and staff members who are locally recruited for service in established offices away from Headquarters may be paid termination indemnity if and as provided in their letters of appointment.

2927

Annex IV

Repatriation grant

In principle, the repatriation grant shall be payable to staff members whom the Organization is obligated to repatriate and who at the time of separation are residing, by virtue of their service with the United Nations, outside their country of nationality. The repatriation grant shall not, however, be paid to a staff member who is dismissed. Eligible staff members shall be entitled to a repatriation grant only upon relocation outside the country of the duty station. Detailed conditions and definitions relating to eligibility and requisite evidence of relocation shall be determined by the Secretary-General.

Years of continuous service away from home country	Staff member with a spouse or dependent child at time of separation	Staff member with neither a spouse nor dependent child at time of separation
		Professional and higher categories	General Service category
	Weeks of gross salary, less staff assessment, where applicable
1	4	3	2
2	8	5	4
3	10	6	5
4	12	7	6
5	14	8	7
6	16	9	8
7	18	10	9
8	20	11	10
9	22	13	11
10	24	14	12
11	26	15	13
12 or more	28	16	14

1227034 (E) 230312
1227034

Please recycle

5555

ST/SGB/2002/13
1 November 2002

UNITED NATIONS

Status, basic rights and duties of United Nations staff members

02-67600 (E) 151102
0267600

2929

5556

Secretary-General's bulletin

Status, basic rights and duties of United Nations staff members

The Secretary-General, pursuant to the request of the General Assembly in paragraph 8 of its resolution 52/252 of 8 September 1998, and in order to assist staff members in understanding their status, basic rights and duties as set out in the text of article IX of the Staff Regulations adopted by the Assembly in resolution 52/252 and of chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules, taken note of in the same resolution, promulgates the publication set out in the annex to the present bulletin:

Section 1
Purposes

1.1 The purpose of the present bulletin is to ensure that all United Nations staff are made aware of the "Standards of conduct for the international civil service" that were adopted by the International Civil Service Commission in 2001 and welcomed by the General Assembly in its resolution 56/244 of 24 December 2001 ("the 2001 standards of conduct"), to replace the 1954 report of the International Civil Service Advisory Board entitled Standards of Conduct in the International Civil Service ("the 1954 standards"). The full text of the 2001 standards of conduct is set out in part V of the annex to the present bulletin.

1.2 The present bulletin also updates the text of the commentary on article 1 of the Staff Regulations and chapter 1 of the 100 series of the Staff Rules previously contained in document ST/SGB/1998/19 by replacing all former references to the 1954 standards by references to the 2001 standards of conduct.

Section 2
General provisions

2.1 The present bulletin with its annex is issued to every staff member who is subject to the Staff Regulations and Rules, including staff members of separately administered organs and programmes.

2.2 The provisions in the annex from chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules are applicable only to staff members appointed under the 100 series of the Rules. Similar provisions are contained in chapter 1 of the 200 and 300 series, applicable to staff members appointed under these rules.

2.3 The role and status of the commentary to the provisions of the Staff Regulations and Rules and of the standards of conduct set out in the annex to the present bulletin are explained in the introduction to the annex.

Section 3
Final provisions

3.1 The present bulletin shall enter into force on 1 December 2002.

3.2 ST/SGB/1998/19 of 1 January 1999 is hereby abolished.

(Signed) Kofi A. Annan
Secretary-General

2930

5557

Annex

Contents

		Page
I.	Introduction	4
II.	General Assembly resolution 52/252 of 8 September 1998	5
III.	Charter of the United Nations and the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations: provisions relating to the status, basic rights and duties of United Nations staff members, with commentary	8
IV.	Scope and purpose of the Staff Regulations of the United Nations: article I of the Staff Regulations of the United Nations and related rules from chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules, with commentary	11
V.	Standards of conduct for the international civil service, 2001	36

2931

5558

I. Introduction

1. Article 101, paragraph 3, of the Charter of the United Nations establishes the universal standard for all staff members employed by the United Nations as the "highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity". It is thus axiomatic that these standards apply to all staff whose employment relationship derives from the authority vested by the Charter in the Organization to employ individuals as staff members. These basic standards are common to all staff, including those of the separately funded and administered organs. The revised text of article I of the Staff Regulations, adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 52/252 of 8 September 1998, and of chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules, noted in that same resolution, express in concrete terms the basic rights and obligations of staff members.

2. The statutory provisions set out in the present annex are an integral part of the Staff Regulations and Rules, with regulations being adopted by the General Assembly pursuant to Article 101, paragraph 1, of the Charter and with rules being promulgated by the Secretary-General pursuant to the authority granted to him or her by the scope and purpose provision of the Staff Regulations.

3. As the Staff Regulations apply to all staff, including the separately funded organs, the Secretary-General has amended the 200 series (Project personnel) and the 300 series (Short-term appointments and appointments of limited duration) of the Staff Rules to bring them into line with the 100 series.

4. The provisions of article I of the Staff Regulations are in most parts very general as they must apply to all staff. Similarly, the provisions of chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules contained in the present annex are, for the most part, very general as they must apply to all staff appointed under the 100 series of the Staff Rules. Pursuant to the request of the General Assembly in resolution 52/252, it is envisaged that additional rules for particular groups of staff such as finance officers, procurement officers and staff of separately funded organs will be prepared and promulgated by administrative issuances dealing with their status, rights and obligations. It is not appropriate to deal with such specialized matters in the Staff Regulations and Rules.

Role of the commentary

5. Each provision of the Staff Regulations and Rules set out in the present annex is followed by a commentary. The commentary is designed to explain individual provisions and to help staff members understand each provision by placing it into context. It is not part of the Staff Regulations and Rules and so is not a legal "norm" or imperative, nor does it have the legal force of a rule. It is, however, an official guide published by the Secretary-General for the use of management and staff on the scope and application of the rules contained in this annex. Staff may thus safely rely on the commentary to guide their actions since management will use it in interpreting and applying those rules. The commentary will be updated from time to time in consultation with representatives of the staff in the Staff-Management Coordination Committee established under chapter VIII of the Staff Rules in the light of experience in applying the rules to specific instances.

2932

5559

6. In view of the importance of the revised text of article I of the Staff Regulations adopted by the General Assembly in resolution 52/252 and of chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules noted in the same resolution, and in view of the need for staff to have a guide to their status, rights and duties conveniently at hand, the present annex contains extracts from the Charter and the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, the text of article I of the Staff Regulations and the text of the related provisions of chapter I of the Staff Rules, together with the explanatory commentary, as well as the text of resolution 52/252 and of the "Standards of conduct for the international civil service" adopted by the International Civil Service Commission in 2001 and welcomed by the General Assembly in its resolution 56/244 (the 2001 standards of conduct).

Status of the "Standards of conduct for the international civil service"

7. The standards of conduct adopted in 2001 revised and updated the 1954 report of the International Civil Service Advisory Board entitled Standards of Conduct in the International Civil Service in order to assist staff members and executive heads of the organizations to understand better the obligations placed on staff conduct by the Charter and the Staff Regulations and Rules. The 1954 report has been continually cited by successive Secretaries-General and by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal when assessing conduct of staff. The revised text is reproduced in the present annex as an illustrative guide to expected standards of conduct. The standards of conduct do not have the force of law as they provide a discussion of expected standards to help staff understand their role as international civil servants rather than a set of binding rules. References to relevant paragraphs in the standards of conduct are made in the commentary.

II. General Assembly resolution 52/252 of 8 September 1998

Revisions to article I of the Staff Regulations and chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules of the United Nations

The General Assembly,

Recalling Articles 97, 98, 100, 101 and 105 of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling also its resolution 52/12 B of 19 December 1997,

Noting with concern the limited time it had at its disposal to consider this matter,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General of 17 October 1997[a] and 28 July 1998[b] entitled "Proposed United Nations Code of Conduct",

Taking note with appreciation of the comments provided by the International Civil Service Commission on the revised text of article I of the Staff Regulations

[a] A/52/488.

[b] A/52/488/Add.1.

2933

5560

and chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules applicable to United Nations staff members,[c]

Taking note of the views expressed by Member States in the Fifth Committee on this question,[d]

Having heard the views expressed by staff representatives in the Fifth Committee[e] in accordance with General Assembly resolution 35/213 of 17 December 1980,

1. Adopts the revised text of article I of the Staff Regulations, and takes note of the revised text of chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules applicable to United Nations staff members, as set out in annex I to the report of the Secretary-General of 17 October 1997,[a] and not to other organizations, subject to the following modifications:

(a) The provisions contained in new staff regulations 1.1 (c) and 1.2 (g), and in new staff rule 101.2 (h) of the original proposal as set out in the report of the Secretary-General of 17 October 1997, which deal with staff representatives, are deleted, as indicated in the report of the Secretary-General of 28 July 1998;[b]

(b) The phrase "and in the relevant resolutions and decisions of the General Assembly" is inserted after "Staff Regulations and Rules" in new staff regulation 1.1 (c);

(c) The phrase "in the employment of staff and" is deleted from new staff regulation 1.1 (d);

(d) Article 99 is deleted from annex I, section A;[a]

(e) At the end of new staff regulation 1.1 (f), the words "in accordance with the relevant instruments" are added;

(f) New staff regulation 1.2 (o) is replaced with the following:

"All staff members at the assistant secretary-general level and above shall be required to file financial disclosure statements upon appointment and at intervals as prescribed by the Secretary-General, in respect of themselves and their dependent children, including any substantial transfers of assets and property to spouses and dependent children from the staff member or from any other source that might constitute a conflict of interest, after knowledge of the appointment or during its tenure, to provide certification stating that there is no conflict of interest with regard to the economic activities of spouses and dependent children, and to assist the Secretary-General in verifying the above-mentioned certification on his special request. The financial disclosure statements will remain confidential and will only be used, as prescribed by the Secretary-General, in making determinations pursuant to staff regulation 1.2 (n);"

2. Decides to insert between the second and third sentences of the text of the "Scope and purpose" provision of the Staff Regulations, the following sentence:

---

[c] See A/52/30/Add.1.

[d] See Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifty-second Session, Fifth Committee, 53rd, 56th, 58th and 67th to 69th meetings (A/C.5/52/SR.53, 56, 58 and 67-69), and corrigendum.

[e] Ibid., 53rd meeting (A/C.5/52/SR.53), and corrigendum.

2934

"For the purposes of these Regulations, the expressions 'United Nations Secretariat', 'staff members' or 'staff' shall refer to all the staff members of the Secretariat, within the meaning of Article 97 of the Charter of the United Nations, whose employment and contractual relationship are defined by a letter of appointment subject to regulations promulgated by the General Assembly pursuant to Article 101, paragraph 1, of the Charter of the United Nations.";

3. Decides also that the amendments to the Staff Regulations adopted in the present resolution and the related amendments to the Staff Rules shall become effective on 1 January 1999;

4. Emphasizes that the implementation of new staff regulation 1.2 (b) should take into account also the definition of integrity provided in the 1954 report of the International Civil Service Advisory Board entitled Standards of Conduct in the International Civil Service, in accordance with paragraph 28 of the comments of the International Civil Service Commission;[c]

5. Also emphasizes that the implementation of new staff rule 101.2 (d) should be in accordance with the definition provided in administrative instruction ST/AI/379 of 29 October 1992;

6. Further emphasizes that managers, as staff members, are bound by the duties and obligations set out in new article I of the Staff Regulations and chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules, and that their higher-level functions and responsibilities entail increased accountability for the proper performance of all their duties in managing the human and financial resources entrusted to them;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to emphasize in the commentary on new article I of the Staff Regulations and chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules that the higher level of responsibilities associated with managerial functions entails a commensurate increase in the accountability of managers;

8. Stresses the importance of the provisions governing the status and the basic rights and duties of staff members, requests the Secretary-General to issue to every staff member in separate form the text of Articles 97, 98, 100, 101 and 105 of the Charter of the United Nations and relevant extracts from the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 22 A (I) of 13 February 1946, as well as the text of new article I of the Staff Regulations and chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules, together with the explanatory commentary,[f] the text of the present resolution and the 1954 report of the International Civil Service Advisory Board entitled Standards of Conduct in the International Civil Service;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to expedite the submission to the General Assembly, by its fifty-fourth session, of appropriate regulations and rules governing the status, basic rights and duties of the Secretary-General, officials other than Secretariat officials and experts on mission;

10. Also requests the Secretary-General to prepare, as a matter of priority, additional rules for particular groups of staff such as finance officers, procurement officers and staff of separately funded organs, in accordance with paragraph 10 of his report;[a]

[f] See A/52/488, annex II and A/52/488/Add.1, sect. II.

5562

11. Further requests the Secretary-General to prepare for consideration by the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session a text of the Staff Regulations drafted in gender-neutral terms;

12. Notes that the Secretary-General will prepare amendments to the 200 and 300 series of the Staff Rules to reflect the amendments to article I of the Staff Regulations, and notes also that such amendments to the Staff Rules are subject to the requirements of staff regulations 12.2, 12.3 and 12.4;

13. Notes further that the International Civil Service Commission has decided to include in its work programme the updating of the 1954 Standards of Conduct in the International Civil Service of the International Civil Service Advisory Board in consultation with the Consultative Committee on Administrative Questions, and looks forward to the results of this review.

92nd plenary meeting
8 September 1998

III. Charter of the United Nations and the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations

Provisions relating to the status, basic rights and duties of United Nations staff members, with commentary

A. Charter of the United Nations

Chapter III Organs

Article 7

1. There are established as the principal organs of the United Nations: a General Assembly, a Security Council, an Economic and Social Council, a Trusteeship Council, an International Court of Justice, and a Secretariat.

2. Such subsidiary organs as may be found necessary may be established in accordance with the present Charter.

Article 8

The United Nations shall place no restrictions on the eligibility of men and women to participate in any capacity and under conditions of equality in its principal and subsidiary organs.

Chapter XV
The Secretariat

Article 97

The Secretariat shall comprise a Secretary-General and such staff as the Organization may require. The Secretary-General shall be appointed by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council. He shall be the chief administrative officer of the Organization.

2936

5563

Article 98

The Secretary-General shall act in that capacity in all meetings of the General Assembly, of the Security Council, of the Economic and Social Council, and of the Trusteeship Council, and shall perform such other functions as are entrusted to him by these organs. The Secretary-General shall make an annual report to the General Assembly on the work of the Organization.

Article 100

1. In the performance of their duties the Secretary-General and the staff shall not seek or receive instructions from any Government or from any other authority external to the Organization. They shall refrain from any action which might reflect on their position as international officials responsible only to the Organization.

2. Each Member of the United Nations undertakes to respect the exclusively international character of the responsibilities of the Secretary-General and the staff and not to seek to influence them in the discharge of their responsibilities.

Article 101

1. The staff shall be appointed by the Secretary-General under regulations established by the General Assembly.

2. Appropriate staffs shall be permanently assigned to the Economic and Social Council, the Trusteeship Council, and, as required, to other organs of the United Nations. These staffs shall form a part of the Secretariat.

3. The paramount consideration in the employment of the staff and the determination of the conditions of service shall be the necessity of securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity. Due regard shall be paid to the importance of recruiting the staff on as wide a geographical basis as possible.

Chapter XVI
Miscellaneous provisions

Article 105

1. The Organization shall enjoy in the territory of each of its Members such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the fulfilment of its purposes.

2. Representatives of the Members of the United Nations and officials of the Organization shall similarly enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the Organization.

3. The General Assembly may make recommendations with a view to determining the details of the application of paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article or may propose conventions to the Members of the United Nations for this purpose.

2937

5564

B. Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, adopted by the General Assembly by its resolution 22 (I) of 13 February 1946

Article V

Section 20. Privileges and immunities are granted to officials in the interests of the United Nations and not for the personal benefit of the individuals themselves ...

Section 21. The United Nations shall cooperate at all times with the appropriate authorities of Members to facilitate the proper administration of justice, secure the observance of police regulations, and prevent the occurrence of any abuse in connection with the privileges, immunities and facilities ...

Commentary

Staff members

1. The Charter requires that staff members be "appointed" by the Secretary-General (or by those to whom this power has been delegated, either by the Secretary-General alone or by the Secretary-General at the direction of the General Assembly). The hallmark of a staff relationship is "appointment", and this is done through a letter of appointment pursuant to staff regulation 4.1. The Staff Regulations, as revised by the General Assembly in its resolution 52/252, apply to all staff members of the Secretariat, within the meaning of Article 97 of the Charter, whose employment relationship and contractual link with the Organization are through a letter of appointment issued pursuant to regulations promulgated by the General Assembly.

2. To ensure that the revised Regulations apply to all staff members of the Organization, including all staff members of all its principal and subsidiary organs, even those with entirely separate administrations, the following sentence has been inserted between the second and third sentence of the "Scope and purpose" provision of the Staff Regulations:

> "For the purposes of these Regulations, the expressions 'United Nations Secretariat', 'staff members' or 'staff' shall refer to all the staff members of the Secretariat, within the meaning of Article 97 of the Charter of the United Nations, whose employment and contractual relationship are defined by a letter of appointment subject to regulations promulgated by the General Assembly pursuant to Article 101, paragraph 1, of the Charter."

The entire text is shown in section IV of the present annex.

3. Article 105 of the Charter empowers the General Assembly to make provisions for the privileges and immunities of the "officials" of the Organization. The Assembly did so by adopting the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations on 13 February 1946 (hereafter the "General Convention"). Article V of the General Convention provides for privileges and immunities for officials and article VII provides for the issue of United Nations laissez-passers to officials. By its resolution 76 (I) of 7 December 1946, the Assembly approved that the provisions in articles V and VII of the General Convention apply to all staff members of the United Nations with the exception of those "recruited locally and assigned to hourly rates". Thus all staff members governed by the Staff Regulations are officials of the Organization.

2938

5565

IV. Scope and purpose of the Staff Regulations of the United Nations

Article I of the Staff Regulations of the United Nations and related rules from chapter I of the 100 series of the Staff Rules, with commentary

Staff Regulations of the United Nations
Scope and purpose

The Staff Regulations embody the fundamental conditions of service and the basic rights, duties and obligations of the United Nations Secretariat. They represent the broad principles of personnel policy for the staffing and administration of the Secretariat. For the purposes of these Regulations, the expressions "United Nations Secretariat", "staff members" or "staff" shall refer to all the staff members of the Secretariat, within the meaning of Article 97 of the Charter of the United Nations, whose employment and contractual relationship are defined by a letter of appointment subject to regulations promulgated by the General Assembly pursuant to Article 101, paragraph 1, of the Charter. The Secretary-General, as the chief administrative officer, shall provide and enforce such staff rules consistent with these principles as he or she considers necessary.

Article I
Duties, obligations and privileges

Staff regulation 1.1
Status of staff

Regulation 1.1 (a)

Staff members are international civil servants. Their responsibilities as staff members are not national but exclusively international.

Commentary

1. It should be noted that the commentary uses the word "former" to refer to the regulations and rules in force when General Assembly resolution 52/252 was adopted (ST/SGB/1998/8 and ST/SGB/Staff Rules/1/9 and Amend.1). The word "new" is used to indicate language that was not in the former Staff Regulations and Rules.

2. Staff regulation 1.1 (a) essentially reproduces the text of the first two sentences of former staff regulation 1.1 (see paras. 3-14, 29 and 30 of the 2001 standards of conduct), reproduced in section V of the present annex.

2939

5566

Regulation 1.1 (b)

Staff members shall make the following written declaration witnessed by the Secretary-General or his or her authorized representative:

> "I solemnly declare and promise to exercise in all loyalty, discretion and conscience the functions entrusted to me as an international civil servant of the United Nations, to discharge these functions and regulate my conduct with the interests of the United Nations only in view, and not to seek or accept instructions in regard to the performance of my duties from any Government or other source external to the Organization."
>
> "I also solemnly declare and promise to respect the obligations incumbent upon me as set out in the Staff Regulations and Rules."

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.1 (b) contains the declaration of office of staff and its opening words incorporate the text of former staff regulation 1.9 insofar as it relates to staff members (see paras. 3-14 of the 2001 standards of conduct). The first part of staff regulation 1.1 (b) in substance reproduces the text of the declaration set out in former staff regulation 1.9, except that staff regulation 1.1 (b) codifies existing practice under which staff members subscribe to a written declaration but do not make a sworn statement, since the concept of a sworn statement depends upon the operation of local law.

2. The second paragraph of the declaration is new and refers specifically to the Staff Regulations and Rules.

3. A copy of the present bulletin and its annex will be distributed to all new and current staff members.

Regulation 1.1 (c)

The Secretary-General shall ensure that the rights and duties of staff members, as set out in the Charter and the Staff Regulations and Rules and in the relevant resolutions and decisions of the General Assembly, are respected.

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.1 (c) is new.

2. The regulation codifies an implicit duty that falls on the Secretary-General, that is, to ensure that the rights and duties of staff members are respected.

Regulation 1.1 (d)

The Secretary-General shall seek to ensure that the paramount consideration in the determination of the conditions of service shall be the necessity of securing staff of the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity.

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.1 (d) places on the Secretary-General an affirmative duty to seek to ensure that the criteria set out in Article 101, paragraph 3, of the Charter for the determination of the conditions of service of the staff are implemented. This provision is not intended to affect the role of legislative bodies involved in the process of establishing conditions of service. It does, however, seek to formulate the responsibility of the Secretary-General to advocate, in the appropriate forums, the adoption of what he or she considers to be the appropriate conditions of service to secure the recruitment and retention of staff possessing the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity.

2940

5567

2. The salaries of staff in the Professional category and above are determined by reference to the best paying national civil service under what is known as the Noblemaire principle. The salaries of staff in the General Service and related categories are established by the Secretary-General on the basis of the best prevailing conditions of employment in the locality where the United Nations office concerned is located under what is commonly referred to as the Flemming principle. The determination of the conditions of service of staff in the Field Service category follows the same pattern as the Professional category.

Regulation 1.1 (e)

The Staff Regulations apply to all staff at all levels, including staff of the separately funded organs and staff holding appointments under the 100, 200 and 300 series of the Staff Rules.

Commentary

1. Regulation 1.1 (e) makes clear that the Staff Regulations apply to all staff members of the Secretariat within the meaning of Article 97 of the Charter whose contractual link with the Organization is through a letter of appointment issued pursuant to regulations promulgated by the General Assembly.

2. While the Staff Regulations apply to all staff, applicable Staff Rules differ depending on the type of appointment held by the staff member. The 100 series of the Staff Rules applies to all staff except those engaged on technical assistance projects (200 series) and staff engaged for short-term service or for appointments of limited duration (300 series). Similar amendments to the 200 series and 300 series rules have been promulgated as appear in the 100 series, with appropriate modifications required to address the different circumstances of such staff.

Regulation 1.1 (f)

The privileges and immunities enjoyed by the United Nations by virtue of Article 105 of the Charter are conferred in the interests of the Organization. These privileges and immunities furnish no excuse to the staff members who are covered by them to fail to observe laws and police regulations of the State in which they are located nor do they furnish an excuse for non-performance of their private obligations. In any case where an issue arises regarding the application of these privileges and immunities, the staff member shall immediately report the matter to the Secretary-General, who alone may decide whether such privileges and immunities exist and whether they shall be waived in accordance with the relevant instruments.

2941

5568

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.1 (f) essentially reproduces the substance of former staff regulation 1.8 (see the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 39 and 40). It is placed at the end of staff regulation 1.1 as it defines the scope and extent of the privileges and immunities of the United Nations that are enjoyed by staff in the interest of the Organization.

2. Staff rule 101.2 (c) deals with the obligations on staff to honour their private legal obligations.

Staff rule 101.1
Status of staff

The declaration made by a staff member on appointment shall be placed in his or her official status file. A new declaration shall be made after a break in service that exceeds three months.

Commentary

1. Staff rule 101.1 codifies the existing practice of placing written declarations in the official status file. The second sentence seeks to ensure that a new declaration is made after a break in service that exceeds three months unless the staff member is reinstated and the staff member's services are considered continuous under current staff rule 104.3 (b).

2. The Staff Regulations adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 52/252 entered into force on 1 January 1999. They are binding on all staff in service on that date, as well as staff recruited on or after that date. The declaration previously made by staff already in service on 1 January 1999 at the time of their entry on duty remains in effect. Thus, it is not necessary that they sign the new declaration set out in staff regulation 1.1 (b).

Staff regulation 1.2
Basic rights and obligations of staff

Core values

Regulation 1.2 (a)

Staff members shall uphold and respect the principles set out in the Charter, including faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women. Consequently, staff members shall exhibit respect for all cultures; they shall not discriminate against any individual or group of individuals or otherwise abuse the power and authority vested in them.

Commentary

This provision describes the basic values expected of international civil servants because of their status. At the heart of those values are the principles set out in the preamble to the Charter. The first sentence is a quotation from those opening words and the second sentence is the obligation on staff flowing from a commitment to those values (see also the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 2, 3, 6, 13, 14, 20 and 36).

2942

5569

Regulation 1.2 (b)

Staff members shall uphold the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity. The concept of integrity includes, but is not limited to, probity, impartiality, fairness, honesty and truthfulness in all matters affecting their work and status.

Commentary

1. This provision describes more basic values expected of international civil servants because of their status. It is derived from Article 101, paragraph 3, of the Charter and affirmatively places on staff the obligation to uphold the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity after appointment to the Secretariat.

2. At the heart of those values is integrity, allied with a dedication to the values and principles set out in the Charter. As discussed in paragraph 5 of the 2001 standards of conduct, the concept of integrity "embraces all aspects of behaviour of an international civil servant, including such qualities as honesty, truthfulness, impartiality and incorruptibility".

3. Various other provisions deal with particular manifestations of this set of basic values in different circumstances, for example, staff regulations 1.2 (d) to (i), (m) and (n).

General rights and obligations

Regulation 1.2 (c)

Staff members are subject to the authority of the Secretary-General and to assignment by him or her to any of the activities or offices of the United Nations. In exercising this authority the Secretary-General shall seek to ensure, having regard to the circumstances, that all necessary safety and security arrangements are made for staff carrying out the responsibilities entrusted to them.

Commentary

1. The opening sentence of staff regulation 1.2 (c) reproduces the first sentence of former staff regulation 1.2.

2. The obligations of Member States for the security of staff are set out in Article 105 of the Charter, which provides that the Organization and its officials shall enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the exercise of their functions.

3. The Secretary-General, as chief administrative officer, has an inherent responsibility to seek to ensure the safety of staff. This regulation recognizes that responsibility as a basic right of staff (see also the 2001 standards of conduct, para. 37).

4. In exercising his or her authority to assign staff to any of the activities of the Organization, the Secretary-General shall seek to ensure that, while assigned to hardship areas, staff are afforded reasonable conditions of life and work having regard to the existing conditions.

2943

5570

5. Furthermore, since staff are subject to assignment, measures should be taken to ensure that staff are properly advised, before departure, of conditions prevailing at the duty station to which they are assigned.

Regulation 1.2 (d)

In the performance of their duties staff members shall neither seek nor accept instructions from any Government or from any other source external to the Organization.

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (d) reproduces the essence of former staff regulation 1.3 and flows from the first sentence of Article 100, paragraph 1, of the Charter (see the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 8, 12 and 30).

2. The new regulation makes clear that directions or instructions to staff come from the Secretary-General, who must fulfil the legislative mandates of the Organization. This is true in all areas, including, for example, decisions relating to the appointment and promotion of staff, which are for the Secretary-General to make as chief administrative officer of the Organization.

Regulation 1.2 (e)

By accepting appointment, staff members pledge themselves to discharge their functions and regulate their conduct with the interests of the Organization only in view. Loyalty to the aims, principles and purposes of the United Nations, as set forth in its Charter, is a fundamental obligation of all staff members by virtue of their status as international civil servants.

Commentary

1. The first sentence of staff regulation 1.2 (e) sets out an idea that is in former staff regulation 1.1 and former staff regulation 1.9, which contains the oath or declaration of office, that is, that staff must regulate their conduct with only the interests of the Organization in view (see the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 4 and 5). The second sentence of staff regulation 1.2 (e) is new and focuses on the concept of loyalty to the aims, principles and purposes of the Organization as set out in the Charter (which is alluded to in the declaration contained in staff regulation 1.1 (b)) (ibid., paras. 4, 7 and 30). It was considered important to highlight those obligations which arise from the very status of a staff member and which, at present, are set out only in the declaration subscribed to by staff upon their entry on duty.

2. The Secretary-General, and those to whom he or she has delegated decision-making authority, has the responsibility to make decisions as to whether the staff have complied with the provisions of the Staff Regulations and Rules. Since no set of rules, no matter how long or complex, can cover all situations, it is clear that there must be discretion in the application of the rules. This is common to all systems of administrative law. However, the discretionary authority of the Secretary-General is not unlimited and it has consistently been held by the Administrative Tribunal that decisions cannot be tainted by prejudice, improper motive or mistake of fact. The Administrative Tribunal adjudicates claims by staff that decisions have not been properly taken.

2944

5571

Regulation 1.2 (f)

While staff members' personal views and convictions, including their political and religious convictions, remain inviolable, staff members shall ensure that those views and convictions do not adversely affect their official duties or the interests of the United Nations. They shall conduct themselves at all times in a manner befitting their status as international civil servants and shall not engage in any activity that is incompatible with the proper discharge of their duties with the United Nations. They shall avoid any action and, in particular, any kind of public pronouncement that may adversely reflect on their status, or on the integrity, independence and impartiality that are required by that status.

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (f) generally reproduces the essence of former staff regulation 1.4. The core idea of conduct befitting an international civil servant was considered by the International Civil Service Commission in 2001. The Commission indicated that:

> "... international civil servants have a special calling: to serve the ideals of peace, of respect for fundamental rights, of economic and social progress, and of international cooperation. It is therefore incumbent on international civil servants to adhere to the highest standards of conduct; for ultimately, it is the international civil service that will enable the United Nations system to bring about a just and peaceful world."[g]

(See the 2001 standards of conduct, para. 2; see also para. 5 on the integrity expected of international civil servants; paras. 4, 7, 21 and 33 on loyalty; para. 6 on tolerance and understanding; paras. 8-10 on impartiality; paras. 11 and 12 on independence; paras. 13 and 36 on international outlook; and para. 14 on freedom from discrimination.)

2. The first sentence of regulation 1.2 (f) is a revision of the second sentence in former staff regulation 1.4, which provided that:

> "While they are not expected to give up their national sentiments, or their political and religious convictions, they shall at all times comport themselves with the reserve and tact incumbent upon them by reason of their international status."

The revision recasts this obligation in a more positive tone. In the 2001 standards of conduct, the Commission noted that:

> "Impartiality implies tolerance and restraint, particularly in dealing with political or religious convictions. While their personal views remain inviolate, international civil servants do not have the freedom of private persons to take sides or to express their convictions publicly on controversial matters, either

[g] Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifty-sixth Session, Supplement No. 30 (A/56/30), annex II, para. 2.

2945

5572

individually or as members of a group. This can mean that, in certain situations, personal views should only be expressed with tact and discretion."[h]

3. As noted in the commentary to regulation 1.2 (e), it is for the Secretary-General to decide whether a staff member has met the standards set out in this provision. The Administrative Tribunal has consistently maintained that, while the Secretary-General has the responsibility and discretion to assess a staff member's conduct, such discretion must be exercised reasonably, without improper motives and in accordance with the requirements of due process.

Regulation 1.2 (g)

Staff members shall not use their office or knowledge gained from their official functions for private gain, financial or otherwise, or for the private gain of any third party, including family, friends and those they favour. Nor shall staff members use their office for personal reasons to prejudice the positions of those they do not favour.

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (g) builds on ideas in former staff regulation 1.5 and codifies principles set out in the 2001 standards of conduct (see paras. 21, 22, 25 and 34). The use of one's office for personal gain is clearly unacceptable. This includes not only conducting business from a United Nations office, but also such things as using the United Nations facilities for a business, using the United Nations name, logo or address for a business or approving a contract for a family business without disclosure. It also reflects the principle set out in former staff regulation 1.5 that staff members shall not use information that has not been made public for the private advantage of the staff member or any third party.

2. Staff regulation 1.2 (g), for the sake of clarity, makes specific reference to the prohibition on a staff member favouring a third party, including family or friends, from profiting from a staff member's position or the exercise of his or her functions. The term "friends" is broad and seeks to encompass not only friends as normally understood but also relationships that are not recognized by the Staff Regulations and Rules as creating a dependency.

3. The regulation also prohibits the use of office or knowledge gained from that office for personal reasons to prejudice or harm the careers of individual staff members or harm third parties.

Regulation 1.2 (h)

Staff members may exercise the right to vote but shall ensure that their participation in any political activity is consistent with, and does not reflect adversely upon, the independence and impartiality required by their status as international civil servants.

[h] Ibid., para. 9.

2946

5573

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (h) reproduces the essence of the text of former staff regulation 1.7 (see the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 9, 10, 29, 44 and 45), but the provision is cast in a more positive form to ensure that the emphasis is on the need to ensure that political activities do not have an impact on the independence and impartiality of staff rather than suggesting that there is some problem with staff having political views.

2. The notion of consistency with the status of an international civil servant is to be determined by the Secretary-General in view of the necessity of staff being, and appearing to be, independent and impartial. Thus, it is clear that staff members cannot be candidates for political office. In case of doubt, inquiries could be made by staff pursuant to staff rule 101.2 (r).

3. Staff members, of course, have the right to form staff representative bodies in accordance with staff regulations 8.1 and 8.2 in order to ensure, in the words of staff regulation 8.1, "the effective participation of staff in identifying, examining and resolving issues relating to staff welfare, including conditions of work, general conditions of life and other personnel policies".

Regulation 1.2 (i)

Staff members shall exercise the utmost discretion with regard to all matters of official business. They shall not communicate to any Government, entity, person or any other source any information known to them by reason of their official position that they know or ought to have known has not been made public, except as appropriate in the normal course of their duties or by authorization of the Secretary-General. These obligations do not cease upon separation from service.

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (i) generally reproduces the text of former staff regulation 1.5. The text reflects the fact that official information cannot be used for private purposes, except with authorization. This flows from the idea that staff members should place the interests of the Organization above their own (see the 2001 standards of conduct, para. 4). It follows that permission must be obtained for disclosure to third parties of information that has not been made public, unless such disclosure is in the normal course of the staff member's duties, that is, that the staff member is either generally authorized to release information (for example, a press officer) or by a staff member specifically authorized to so do (see staff regulation 1.2 (r) for the duty of staff to cooperate with United Nations investigations).

2. The last sentence of the regulation provides that the obligations contained in the provision do not cease upon separation from service. It may be difficult to enforce such a provision but, at the very least, if a former staff member ignores the regulation, a note could be placed in his or her official status file to prevent re-employment.

2947

5574

Honours, gifts or remuneration

Regulation 1.2 (j)

No staff member shall accept any honour, decoration, favour, gift or remuneration from any Government.

Commentary

1. Staff regulations 1.2 (j), (k), and (l) provide the basic provisions regulating the issue of acceptance by staff members of any honour, decoration, favour, gift or remuneration from outside sources (see the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 46[i] and 47).

2. Former staff regulation 1.6 dealt with this issue in one provision, which prohibited the acceptance of any benefits from a Government, and severely restricted the acceptance of benefits from non-governmental sources. In proposing the language of staff regulation 1.2 (j), the Secretary-General believed that it would be appropriate for the General Assembly to stress the importance of the appearance of strict independence and impartiality of staff and thus to reaffirm the absolute prohibition on acceptance of benefits from Governments. The Secretary-General also believed that the prior exception in former staff regulation 1.6 and former staff rule 101.9 (b), which enabled a staff member to accept honours for war service prior to appointment with the United Nations, should be abolished. By General Assembly resolution 52/252, the Assembly abolished that exception.

3. Staff regulation 1.2 (j) contains the basic rule that staff may not accept any honour, decoration, gift or remuneration from any Government (ibid., paras. 46 and 47).[j] This rule applies whatever the reason for the award, even if the award is unrelated to the staff member's service with the Organization, since it is imperative that an international civil servant be perceived as independent from any national Government.

Regulation 1.2 (k)

If refusal of an unanticipated honour, decoration, favour or gift from a Government would cause embarrassment to the Organization, the staff member may receive it on behalf of the Organization and then report and entrust it to the Secretary-General, who will either retain it for the Organization or arrange for its disposal for the benefit of the Organization or for a charitable purpose.

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (k) is new and seeks to regulate a recurrent problem, namely, when a staff member is given an unanticipated honour, decoration, favour or gift, perhaps in public, by a minister or even a head of State. In such cases, a

[i] Even though paragraph 46 envisages the possibility of authorization by the executive head of an organization of an honour, decoration, gift, favour or remuneration from a Government, this is precluded by staff regulation 1.2 (j), as explained in paras. 2 and 3 of the commentary.

[j] Staff regulation 3.4 (c) envisages that staff members may accept child benefits from their Governments but that, in such a case, United Nations dependency benefits will be reduced. The United Nations has also accepted housing from Governments and when staff are assigned to such housing, rental deductions from emoluments are applicable.

2948

5575

public refusal could cause a needlessly unpleasant incident. In such cases, the new regulation states that the unanticipated honour, decoration, favour or gift may be received by the staff member, but on behalf of the United Nations. The honour, decoration, favour or gift must then be given to the Secretary-General for retention or disposal by the Organization. Remuneration from a Government must always be refused and such refusal, as staff are paid by the Organization, could hardly cause embarrassment.

2. The Secretary-General will write to all Member States to inform them of the Organization's policy on acceptance of honours, decorations, favours, gifts or remuneration so that incidents of this nature can be avoided to the largest extent possible.

Regulation 1.2 (l)

No staff member shall accept any honour, decoration, favour, gift or remuneration from any non-governmental source without first obtaining the approval of the Secretary-General.

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (l) requires that a staff member not accept any honour, decoration, favour, gift or remuneration from a non-governmental source without first obtaining the approval of the Secretary-General (see also the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 46 and 47). This provision is based on former staff regulation 1.6.

2. A non-governmental source means any intergovernmental organization, non-governmental organization or any private source.

Conflict of interest

Regulation 1.2 (m)

Staff members shall not be actively associated with the management of, or hold a financial interest in, any profit-making, business or other concern, if it were possible for the staff member or the profit-making, business or other concern to benefit from such association or financial interest by reason of his or her position with the United Nations.

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (m) reproduces the essence of former staff rule 101.6 (b) and clarifies its scope. The provision was made a staff regulation because of its importance. Its purpose is to put staff on notice that they cannot be actively associated with a profit-making, business or other concern, if either the concern or the staff member is to profit by the association with the Organization. For example, a staff member working in the Office of Legal Affairs cannot act for outside clients (see also the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 21 and 22). It will be for the Secretary-General to judge whether a particular act raises a conflict of interest situation.

2. This provision does not seek to affect the efforts of staff associations to raise funds for their activities from staff.

2949

5576

Regulation 1.2 (n)

All staff members at the Assistant Secretary-General level and above shall be required to file financial disclosure statements upon appointment and at intervals as prescribed by the Secretary-General, in respect of themselves and their dependent children, including any substantial transfers of assets and property to spouses and dependent children from the staff member or from any other source that might constitute a conflict of interest, after knowledge of the appointment or during its tenure, to provide certification stating that there is no conflict of interest with regard to the economic activities of spouses and dependent children, and to assist the Secretary-General in verifying the above-mentioned certification on his or her special request. The financial disclosure statements will remain confidential and will only be used, as prescribed by the Secretary-General, in making determinations pursuant to staff regulation 1.2 (m).

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (n) requires all staff at the assistant secretary-general level and above to submit financial disclosure statements on appointment and at intervals as prescribed by the Secretary-General (see also the 2001 standards of conduct, para. 22). This requirement is designed to minimize the risk of officials being perceived as using their position for personal gain. The regulation makes it clear that these financial disclosure statements will remain confidential and will only be used by the Secretary-General in assessing whether a conflict of interest situation exists.

2. Staff regulation 1.2 (n) also gives to the Secretary-General the authority to prescribe the form of such disclosure statements and the periodicity of their filing and authorizes him or her to establish procedures to ensure that the statements remain confidential.

Outside employment and activities

Regulation 1.2 (o)

Staff members shall not engage in any outside occupation or employment, whether remunerated or not, without the approval of the Secretary-General.

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (o), which is based on former staff rule 101.6 (e), reflects the Organization's long-standing policy on outside occupation or employment, whether during or outside the work week (see also the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 41-45).

2. The notion of occupation includes the practice of a profession (whether as an employee or an independent contractor). Employment is a legal relationship pursuant to which one person is providing work and skill at the control and direction of another.

Regulation 1.2 (p)

The Secretary-General may authorize staff members to engage in an outside occupation or employment, whether remunerated or not, if:

2950

5577

(i) The outside occupation or employment does not conflict with the staff member's official functions or the status of an international civil servant;

(ii) The outside occupation or employment is not against the interest of the United Nations; and

(iii) The outside occupation or employment is permitted by local law at the duty station or where the occupation or employment occurs.

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (p) is new and sets out in specific terms the Organization's long-standing requirements that have to be met before a staff member may be given permission to engage in an outside occupation or employment. The key factors in determining whether permission should be granted relate to the compatibility of that occupation or employment with the status and functions being discharged by the staff member and with the interest of the United Nations (see also the 2001 standards of conduct, para. 41). In addition, the occupation or employment must be permitted by local law. If the Secretary-General decides that permission for such occupation or employment should be denied, a reason will be given.

2. The first requirement is that there be no conflict with the staff member's official functions or with the staff member's status as an international civil servant. For example, it would not be appropriate for a member of the Office of Legal Affairs to be working part-time in an outside law firm.

3. The second requirement is that such occupation or employment not be against the interest of the United Nations, that is, that the occupation or employment does not reflect adversely upon the United Nations. For example, permission would not be granted for a staff member to work with an organization the goals of which are incompatible with those of the United Nations or to work in a capacity that could call into question the impartiality and independence of the staff member.

4. The third requirement is that the occupation or employment be permitted under the law of the duty station concerned. For example, in the United States of America, staff holding G-4 visas are not permitted under local law to accept outside employment, or to earn money from an occupation, so no permission would be granted.

5. It should be remarked that private non-remunerated activities that have nothing to do with a staff member's official functions would be at the discretion of the staff member (for example, the secretary of a stamp club) (see the 2001 standards of conduct, para 38).

6. Private activities that relate to the United Nations are regulated by staff rule 101.2 (p).

Use of property and assets

Regulation 1.2 (q)

Staff members shall use the property and assets of the Organization only for official purposes and shall exercise reasonable care when utilizing such property and assets.

2951

5578

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (q) is new and makes explicit the duty to use reasonable care when utilizing the property and assets of the Organization, which duty is behind several provisions in the Financial Rules and the Staff Rules.

2. Management accountability for the way in which staff resources are utilized is discussed in the commentary to staff rule 101.3 (a).

Regulation 1.2 (r)

Staff members must respond fully to requests for information from staff members and other officials of the Organization authorized to investigate the possible misuse of funds, waste or abuse.

Commentary

1. Staff regulation 1.2 (r) builds on the obligation to supply information set out in current staff rule 104.4. This provision seeks to ensure that staff members clearly understand that they must cooperate with official investigations by the Organization and must supply information on their official actions to, for example, the internal or external auditors. Such requests are not in the nature of criminal inquiries where an individual may refuse to answer on the basis of self-incrimination. The issue in the employment relationship between a staff member and the Organization is whether the highest standards of competence, efficiency and integrity have been met.

2. The Secretary-General has the authority to request staff to supply information and the staff have a duty to respond. This is without prejudice to the rights of staff under chapter X of the Staff Regulations and Rules. It should be noted that, although the Secretary-General obviously has control of United Nations premises, any investigations that involve the staff member's home would require the consent of the staff member or would have to be conducted by the appropriate authorities in accordance with national law.

3. If, after investigation, a staff member is charged with misconduct, the staff member is entitled to all the due process protections set out in the Staff Regulations and Rules and administrative issuances promulgated thereunder. This includes the freedom to decide whether the staff member wishes to make any statements or submissions in response to the charge.

Staff rule 101.2
Basic rights and obligations of staff

General

Rule 101.2 (a)

Disciplinary procedures set out in article X of the Staff Regulations and chapter X of the Staff Rules may be instituted against a staff member who fails to comply with his or her obligations and the standards of conduct set out in the Charter of the United Nations, the Staff Regulations and Rules, the Financial Regulations and Rules and all administrative issuances.

2952

5579

Commentary

Staff rule 101.2 (a) is new. It will ensure that staff are held accountable through disciplinary procedures for failure to comply with their obligations and the standards of conduct, set out in the Charter of the United Nations, the Staff Regulations and Rules, the Financial Regulations and Rules and all related issuances. Administrative issuances refer to issuances promulgated by the Secretary-General, or by those who are delegated authority by the Secretary-General, in furtherance of the Staff Regulations and Rules and the Financial Regulations and Rules (see ST/SGB/1997/1).

Rule 101.2 (b)

Staff members shall follow the directions and instructions properly issued by the Secretary-General and their supervisors.

Commentary

1. Staff rule 101.2 (b) deals with the obligation of staff to follow directions properly given by supervising officials (see the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 17 and 18). The use of the word "properly" means that a supervisor who gives improper instructions will be held accountable since staff regulation 1.1 (c) introduces an affirmative duty on the Secretary-General to ensure that the rights and duties of staff are respected.

2. In the 2001 standards of conduct, the International Civil Service Commission noted that staff members have to follow the instructions they receive in connection with their official functions but also have a right to ask for written instructions if they have doubts as to the consistency of the instruction with the Charter or any other constitutional instrument, decisions of the governing bodies or administrative rules and regulations (ibid. para. 18). Although it is clear that staff must follow instructions, it should also be noted that staff have a right to appeal instructions that they consider infringe their rights pursuant to chapter XI of the Staff Rules.

3. Obviously, staff do not have to follow instructions that are manifestly inconsistent with their official functions or threaten their safety or have nothing to do with their official activities since such instructions are not proper. Such cases are rare and can usually be handled by seeking a review from the next level supervisor or by consulting the Office of Human Resources Management.

Rule 101.2 (c)

Staff members must comply with local laws and honour their private legal obligations, including, but not limited to, the obligation to honour orders of competent courts.

Commentary

1. Staff rule 101.2 (c) is really an amplification of staff regulation 1.1 (f) (formerly staff regulation 1.8), which provides that the privileges and immunities of the Organization afford no excuse to staff for non-performance of their private obligations (see the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 39 and 40). The Secretary-General shall determine in any particular case whether such privileges and immunities exist and, if so, whether they shall be waived.

2953

5580

2. Staff rule 101.2 (c) makes clear to staff that they have an obligation to honour such private obligations. This provision will assist the Organization effectively to ensure that staff respect court orders relating to their private obligations. In the event that a plaintiff forwards to the Organization a court order against a staff member, the Administration will seek the views of the staff member before taking any action on the basis of that order. It is the responsibility of staff who have an order against them that they contest to avail themselves of all existing means under the applicable national law to appeal the order and/or obtain relief from the obligation to comply with the order pending its appeal.

3. Failure to honour such private obligations may be treated as a disciplinary matter under article X of the Staff Regulations and chapter X of the Staff Rules. In cases of non-compliance with family support court orders, deductions from staff members' salaries, wages and other emoluments may be made in accordance with the procedures set out in Secretary-General's bulletin ST/SGB/1999/4 as may be amended or replaced by another issuance on the subject.

Specific instances of prohibited conduct

Rule 101.2 (d)

Any form of discrimination or harassment, including sexual or gender harassment, as well as physical or verbal abuse at the workplace or in connection with work, is prohibited.

Commentary

1. Staff rules 101.2 (d) to (i) deal with specific instances of prohibited conduct.

2. Staff rule 101.2 (d) reproduces the core of the Secretary-General's bulletin of 29 October 1992 (ST/SGB/253), as may be amended or replaced by another issuance on the subject, which sets out United Nations policy on equal treatment of men and women in the Secretariat, and which also prohibits all forms of discrimination or harassment (see also the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 14 and 20).

Rule 101.2 (e)

Staff members shall not disrupt or otherwise interfere with any meeting or other official activity of the Organization, nor shall staff members threaten, intimidate or otherwise engage in any conduct intended, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the ability of other staff members to discharge their official duties.

Commentary

1. Staff rule 101.2 (e) prohibits actions that threaten, intimidate or interfere with official functions and activities.

2. The rule is not intended to prevent permitted activities such as the right of staff to peaceful assembly, the right of representatives of staff representative bodies to address the Fifth Committee or other organs that have authorized such procedures or for staff to meet in authorized meeting rooms. What is prohibited are actions that prevent Member States, departments, offices, staff and other authorized persons from holding a meeting or carrying out an official activity. Ultimately the application of the rule will be judgemental but the test is reasonably clear in that conduct which prevents others from performing official functions is not permitted.

2954

3. It is noted that at times staff representatives have for certain periods suspended participation in joint bodies. Withdrawal by staff representatives from joint bodies does not constitute interference with official functions since the Administrative Tribunal has ruled that, in such cases, the Administration may proceed without the consultation normally needed pursuant to article VIII of the Staff Regulations and chapter VIII of the Staff Rules.

Rule 101.2 (f)

Staff members shall not intentionally misrepresent their functions, official title or the nature of their duties to Member States or to any entities or persons external to the United Nations.

Commentary

Staff rule 101.2 (f) prohibits the intentional misrepresentation of official title or duties to outside parties, for example, by placing misleading titles on business cards, usually for private advantage. The use of the word "intentional" makes clear that this is not a careless or accidental act.

Rule 101.2 (g)

Staff members shall not intentionally alter, destroy, misplace or render useless any official document, record or file entrusted to them by virtue of their functions, which document, record or file is intended to be kept as part of the records of the Organization.

Commentary

Staff rule 101.2 (g) puts staff on notice that the intentional unauthorized destruction, alteration or misplacement of records, which were intended to form part of the official files of the Organization, department or office, is prohibited. This has been a problem from time to time in disciplinary cases when key documents are found to be missing from official files of the Organization. The use of the word "intentional" makes clear that this is not a careless or accidental act.

Rule 101.2 (h)

Staff members shall not seek to influence Member States, principal or subsidiary organs of the United Nations or expert groups in order to obtain a change from a position or decision taken by the Secretary-General, including decisions relating to the financing of Secretariat programmes or units or in order to secure support for improving their personal situation or the personal situation of other staff members or for blocking or reversing unfavourable decisions regarding their status or their colleagues' status.

Commentary

Staff rule 101.2 (h) reproduces provisions from the information circular of 2 February 1996 (ST/IC/1996/10) concerning conduct of staff members in relation to Member States (see the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 23-25 and 27). The new rule seeks to make clear that lobbying Member States by individual staff members against positions taken by the Secretary-General is not permitted.

5582

Rule 101.2 (i)

Staff members shall neither offer nor promise any favour, gift, remuneration or any other personal benefit to another staff member or to any third party with a view to causing him or her to perform, fail to perform or delay the performance of any official act. Similarly, staff members shall neither seek nor accept any favour, gift, remuneration or any other personal benefit from another staff member or from any third party in exchange for performing, failing to perform or delaying the performance of any official act.

Commentary

The prohibition in staff rule 101.2 (i) applies to the staff member's relations with other staff members and to the staff member's relations with third parties. While the general proposition is that the practices described in the rule violate the highest standards of integrity required of staff members (see the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 16, 46 and 47), the purpose of the new rule is specifically to deal with "détournement de pouvoir", "trafic d'influence" and other improper or even corrupt practices.

Honours, gifts or remuneration

Rule 101.2 (j)

Acceptance by staff members of any honour, decoration, favour, gift or remuneration from non-governmental sources requires the prior approval of the Secretary-General. Approval shall be granted only in exceptional cases and where such acceptance is not incompatible with the interests of the Organization and with the staff member's status as an international civil servant. However, staff members may occasionally accept, without prior approval, minor gifts of essentially nominal value having regard to the duty station concerned, provided that all such gifts are promptly disclosed to the head of the office, who may direct that the gift be entrusted to the Organization or returned to the donor.

Commentary

1. Staff rule 101.2 (j) implements staff regulation 1.2 (l). It provides guidance on what honours, decorations, favours, gifts or remuneration may be accepted from non-governmental sources (see the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 46 and 47). In essence, advance approval is required unless the gifts are of essentially nominal value, having regard to the duty station concerned. Acceptance of such items of essentially nominal value would not seem to present any significant risk of undermining the integrity or independence of staff members. The rule thus permits the staff member to accept gifts of essentially nominal value in view of the significant cost and effort that would be involved if staff members were required to seek prior approval.

2. The assessment of what is of "essentially nominal value" must be left to the best judgement of the staff member and the head of the office in the light of circumstances at the duty station concerned, since what is considered a minor gift at a Headquarters duty station may take on a different significance in a small field office. The problem is regulated through a requirement for staff either to obtain permission in advance or to disclose what they have received to the head of the office. It will be up to the head of the office to determine what is acceptable and, if he or she is in doubt, higher authorities may be consulted. As a safeguard against possible abuse, all gifts received in this manner are to be disclosed to the head of the office, who will have authority to direct that gifts already received be returned.

2956

5583

Rule 101.2 (k)

The Secretary-General may authorize staff members to accept from a non-governmental source or a university academic awards, distinctions and tokens of a commemorative or honorary character, such as scrolls, certificates, trophies or other items of essentially nominal monetary value.

Commentary

Staff rule 101.2 (k) is based on former staff rule 101.9 (d) and permits the Secretary-General to authorize staff members to accept certain awards, distinctions and tokens from a non-governmental source or from a university. The rule provides that, for the purpose of the rule, universities are not considered government sources since, in many countries, they are not so considered and it would be incongruous for a staff member to be authorized to accept an honorary degree or certification from universities in some, but not all, countries. An honorary degree or certificate may therefore be accepted from universities in all countries.

Rule 101.2 (l)

Staff members, as part of their official functions, will be expected from time to time to attend governmental or other functions such as meals and diplomatic receptions. Such attendance is not considered receipt of a favour, gift or remuneration within the meaning of the Staff Regulations and Rules.

Commentary

Staff rule 101.2 (l) is new and deals with the issue of attendance at various official functions. It is clear that international officials are required, from time to time, to attend luncheons, dinners and diplomatic receptions. Such attendance will not be considered by the Secretary-General a favour or gift within the meaning of staff regulations 1.2 (j) to (l).

Rule 101.2 (m)

The Secretary-General may, in exceptional cases, provided that this is in the interest of the United Nations and not incompatible with the staff member's status, authorize a staff member to receive from a non-governmental source an honour, decoration, favour, gift or remuneration other than those referred to in staff rules 101.2 (j) to (l) above.

Commentary

Staff rule 101.2 (m) enables the Secretary-General, on an exceptional basis, to authorize a staff member to accept an honour, decoration, favour, gift or remuneration from a non-governmental source that falls outside staff rules 101.2 (j) to (l) as long as such acceptance is in the interests of the United Nations and not inconsistent with the staff member's status. This provision flows from former staff rule 101.9 (c) since it is not possible to define in advance what may be accepted from a non-governmental source.

2957

5584

Conflict of interest

Rule 101.2 (n)

A staff member who has occasion to deal in his or her official capacity with any matter involving a profit-making business or other concern in which he or she holds a financial interest, directly or indirectly, shall disclose the measure of that interest to the Secretary-General and, except as otherwise authorized by the Secretary-General, either dispose of that financial interest or formally excuse himself or herself from participating with regard to any involvement in that matter which gives rise to the conflict of interest situation.

Commentary

1. Staff rule 101.2 (n) is based on former staff rule 101.6 (c). However, the second part is new and deals with the consequences of a staff member disclosing to the Secretary-General that he or she has an interest, direct or indirect, in a profit-making business or other concern (whether profit-making or not-for-profit) with which the United Nations is dealing. In such cases, unless the Secretary-General has authorized the staff member to deal with a particular matter despite the disclosed interest, the staff member will be directed to dispose of the interest or will be excused from dealing with the matter (see also the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 21 and 22).

2. This provision departs from former staff rule 101.6 (d), which provided that the mere holding of shares in a company did not constitute a financial interest that would require disclosure. That provision has been deleted in the interest of transparency and the need to avoid any appearance of conflict of interest. Staff rule 101.2 (n) requires that a staff member, with shares in a corporation with which he or she is to deal, would disclose that interest to his or her supervisor. Obviously whether there was a conflict would depend on the extent of the holding and on the nature of the staff member's duties. The object of the provision is to compel disclosure so that the Secretary-General can decide if there is a conflict situation before a problem arises.

3. If informal procedures are not sufficient to deal with questions that arise under this rule, under confidential clarification procedures established in administrative instruction ST/AI/2000/13 on outside activities, as may be amended or replaced by another issuance on the subject, staff can obtain advice on whether a planned outside occupation, employment or activity would conflict with their status. However, the common sense approach of excusing oneself from any dealings with an entity with which one has a financial interest would normally be appropriate.

Rule 101.2 (o)

The Secretary-General shall establish procedures for the filing and utilization of financial disclosure statements.

2958

5585

Commentary

Staff rule 101.2 (o) provides that the Secretary-General will establish procedures to implement the filing and access to financial disclosure statements. These procedures will ensure that the confidentiality of such forms is respected.

Outside activities

Rule 101.2 (p)

Staff members shall not, except in the normal course of official duties or with the prior approval of the Secretary-General, engage in any of the following acts, if such act relates to the purpose, activities or interests of the United Nations:

(i) Issue statements to the press, radio or other agencies of public information;

(ii) Accept speaking engagements;

(iii) Take part in film, theatre, radio or television productions;

(iv) Submit articles, books or other material for publication.

Commentary

1. Staff rule 101.2 (p) is based on former staff rule 101.6 (e) (see also the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 34 and 41).

2. The rule only requires that a staff member seek permission if the outside activities relate to the purpose, activities or interests of the United Nations. If a request is denied, a reason for that refusal will be given. No permission is needed for social or charitable activities or for activities that have no relation to the Organization.

3. Outside activities that are of benefit to the Organization or the achievement of its goals and contribute to the development of professional skills of staff members are usually not only permitted but also encouraged, for example, the publication of scholarly articles, participation in symposiums and limited teaching activities.

Rule 101.2 (q)

Membership in a political party is permitted, provided that such membership does not entail action, or an obligation to take action, by the staff member contrary to staff regulation 1.2 (h). The payment of normal financial contributions to a political party shall not be construed as an activity inconsistent with the principles set out in staff regulation 1.2 (h).

Commentary

Staff rule 101.2 (q) reproduces the essence of former staff rule 101.8 (a) (see also the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 44 and 45).

2959

5586

Rule 101.2 (r)

The Secretary-General shall establish procedures whereby staff may seek in confidence clarification as to whether proposed outside activities would conflict with their status as international civil servants.

Commentary

Staff rule 101.2 (r) is new and seeks to assist staff to determine if there are conflict situations by requiring the establishment of procedures to enable the staff to seek confidential guidance on these issues (see the 2001 standards of conduct, para. 44).

Travel and per diem for outside activities

Rule 101.2 (s)

Staff members who are authorized by the Secretary-General to participate in activities organized by a Government, intergovernmental organization, non-governmental organization or other private source may receive from the Government, intergovernmental organization, non-governmental organization or private source accommodation and travel and subsistence allowance generally in line with those payable by the United Nations. In such cases the travel subsistence allowance that may otherwise be payable by the United Nations shall be reduced as envisaged in staff rule 107.15 (a).

Commentary

Staff rule 101.2 (s) is new and distinguishes the notion of gifts and so on from invitations routinely extended by Governments, intergovernmental organizations, non-governmental institutions or other private sources to the Secretary-General and staff members to attend conferences or meetings dealing with United Nations-related matters hosted by them. This is currently routinely authorized by the Secretary-General and the rule reflects that current practice. It also provides an opportunity for the Organization to save on allowances that may be payable by the Organization by having the accommodation or travel and subsistence allowance provided by the Government, intergovernmental organization, non-governmental organizations or private source and by reducing the travel subsistence allowance that may otherwise be payable to the staff member.

Staff regulation 1.3
Performance of staff

Regulation 1.3 (a)

Staff members are accountable to the Secretary-General for the proper discharge of their functions. Staff members are required to uphold the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity in the discharge of their functions and their performance will be appraised periodically to ensure that the required standards of performance are met.

2960

5587

Commentary

1. Much of staff regulation 1.3 deals with the standards of performance required of staff members and provides that they will be evaluated and held accountable to meet the required standards established by the Charter. Since the separately funded organs have systems of assessing performance that are adapted to meet their special needs, the provisions in staff regulation 1.3 (a) must remain very general. The regulation now explicitly places on managers the duty to make proper appraisals of performance, which reinforces the solid legislative basis for such procedures and practices.

2. Staff regulation 1.3 (a) makes it clear that staff members are required to uphold the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity in the discharge of their functions (see Article 101 of the Charter and the 2001 standards of conduct, paras. 3-14 and 48-50). The regulation introduces the concept of accountability for performance as a fundamental condition of service.

3. The relationship of integrity to performance is discussed in the commentary to staff rule 101.3 (a).

4. An integral part of the performance of managers is to manage properly the human, financial and other resources entrusted to them. It should be emphasized that the higher level of responsibilities associated with managerial functions of managers entails a commensurate increase in their accountability for the proper performance of all their duties in managing the human and financial resources entrusted to them.

Regulation 1.3 (b)

The whole time of staff members shall be at the disposal of the Secretary-General for the performance of official functions; however, the Secretary-General shall establish a normal working week and shall establish official holidays for each duty station. Exceptions may be made by the Secretary-General as the needs of the service may require and staff members shall be required to work beyond the normal tour of duty when requested to do so.

Commentary

Staff regulation 1.3 (b) combines the last two sentences of former staff regulation 1.2 into one sentence to make it clear that, although staff normally work an ordinary working week, they must work in excess of that working week when directed (see the 2001 standards of conduct, para. 41). It is, of course, clear that any requests to work additional hours must be reasonable and must be related to the needs of the service. Appropriate compensation arrangements are included in appendix B to the Staff Rules. The new regulation abolishes the requirement that those working hours must be reflected in an appendix to the Staff Rules as opposed to being issued in a local instruction.

2961

5588

Staff rule 101.3
Performance of staff members

Rule 101.3 (a)

Staff members shall be evaluated for their efficiency, competence and integrity through performance appraisal mechanisms that shall assess the staff member's compliance with the standards set out in the Staff Regulations and Rules for purposes of accountability.

Commentary

1. Staff rule 101.3 (a) makes explicit that the efficiency, competence and integrity required of staff by the Charter and staff regulation 1.3 (a) will be evaluated and that they will be held accountable to maintain the required standards.

2. Generally speaking an appraisal relates primarily to efficiency and competence, but integrity is part of the essential characteristic of an international civil servant and may have an impact on the performance of official duties. For example, abusive conduct by a staff member to his or her colleagues is not excused even though the staff member is efficient. On the other hand, the staff member's personal life is generally of no concern to a supervisor unless there is an impact on the discharge of his or her functions or on the role of that person as an international civil servant. As noted in the 2001 standards of conduct:

> "4. International civil servants should share the vision of their organizations. It is loyalty to this vision that ensures the integrity and international outlook of international civil servants; it guarantees that they will place the interests of their organization above their own and use its resources in a responsible manner.
>
> "5. The concept of integrity enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations embraces all aspects of behaviour of an international civil servant, including such qualities as honesty, truthfulness, impartiality and incorruptibility. These qualities are as basic as those of competence and efficiency, also enshrined in the Charter."

3. It is important to note that competence and efficiency of staff include not only the way in which they perform their tasks but the way in which they interact with others. As noted in the 2001 standards of conduct, the obligations of staff to their supervisors, and of supervisors to their staff, is of crucial importance. Those duties and obligations bear repeating in this commentary:

> "15. Managers and supervisors are in positions of leadership and it is their responsibility to ensure a harmonious workplace based on mutual respect; they should be open to all views and opinions and make sure that the merits of staff are properly recognized. They need to provide support to them; this is particularly important when they are subject to criticism arising from the carrying out of their duties. Managers are also responsible for guiding and motivating their staff and promoting their development.
>
> "16. It is natural for managers to be seen as role models and they have therefore a special obligation to uphold the highest standards of conduct. It would be quite improper for them to solicit favours, gifts or loans from their staff; they must act impartially, without intimidation and favouritism. In matters relating to the appointment or career of others, no international civil servant should try to influence colleagues for personal reasons.

2962

"17. It is naturally incumbent on managers and supervisors to communicate effectively with their staff and share information with them. International civil servants have a reciprocal responsibility to provide all pertinent facts and information to their supervisors and to abide by and defend decisions taken, even when these do not accord with their personal views.

"18. International civil servants have to follow the instructions they receive in connection with their official functions and if they have doubts as to whether an instruction is consistent with the Charter or any other constitutional instrument, decisions of the governing bodies or administrative rules and regulations, they should first consult their supervisors. If they cannot agree, the international civil servant may ask for written instructions. These may be challenged through the proper institutional mechanisms, but any challenge should not delay carrying out the instruction. International civil servants may also record their views in official files. They should not follow verbal or written instructions that are manifestly inconsistent with their official functions or that threaten their safety or that of others.

"19. It must be the duty of international civil servants to report any breach of the organization's rules and regulations to a higher level official, whose responsibility it is to take appropriate action. An international civil servant who makes such a report in good faith has a right to be protected against reprisals or sanctions."

4. It should be emphasized that supervisors will be assessed not only on their technical competence but also on the way in which they utilize the staff placed under their direction.

Rule 101.3 (b)

The Secretary-General shall seek to ensure that appropriate learning and development programmes are available for the benefit of staff.

Commentary

As staff are required to uphold the highest standards of efficiency and competence and integrity, it follows that during their careers the Secretary-General must seek to ensure that staff are provided with appropriate learning and development opportunities to assist them in meeting the challenges of responding effectively to the changing mandates of the Organization.

Rule 101.3 (c)

Performance reports shall be prepared regularly for all staff members, including at the assistant secretary-general level and above, in accordance with procedures promulgated by the Secretary-General.

5590

Commentary

Staff rule 101.3 (c) replaces staff rule 112.6 and provides that appraisal will be pursuant to procedures promulgated by the Secretary-General.

V. Standards of conduct for the international civil service, 2001[k]

1. The United Nations and the specialized agencies embody the highest aspirations of the peoples of the world. Their aim is to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war and to enable every man, woman and child to live in dignity and freedom.

2. The international civil service bears responsibility for translating these ideals into reality. It relies on the great traditions of public administration that have grown up in member States: competence, integrity, impartiality, independence and discretion. But over and above this, international civil servants have a special calling: to serve the ideals of peace, of respect for fundamental rights, of economic and social progress, and of international cooperation. It is therefore incumbent on international civil servants to adhere to the highest standards of conduct; for, ultimately, it is the international civil service that will enable the United Nations system to bring about a just and peaceful world.

Guiding principles

3. The values that are enshrined in the United Nations organizations must also be those that guide international civil servants in all their actions: fundamental human rights, social justice, the dignity and worth of the human person and respect for the equal rights of men and women and of nations great and small.

4. International civil servants should share the vision of their organizations. It is loyalty to this vision that ensures the integrity and international outlook of international civil servants; it guarantees that they will place the interests of their organization above their own and use its resources in a responsible manner.

5. The concept of integrity enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations embraces all aspects of behaviour of an international civil servant, including such qualities as honesty, truthfulness, impartiality and incorruptibility. These qualities are as basic as those of competence and efficiency, also enshrined in the Charter.

6. Tolerance and understanding are basic human values. They are essential for international civil servants, who must respect all persons equally, without any distinction whatsoever. This respect fosters a climate and a working environment sensitive to the needs of all. To achieve this in a multicultural setting calls for a positive affirmation going well beyond passive acceptance.

7. International loyalty means loyalty to the whole United Nations system and not only to the organization for which one works; international civil servants have an obligation to understand and exemplify this wider loyalty. The need for a cooperative and understanding attitude towards international civil servants of other United Nations organizations is obviously most important where international civil servants of several organizations are serving in the same country or region.

[k] Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifty-sixth Session, Supplement No. 30 (A/56/30), annex II.

2964

5591

8. If the impartiality of the international civil service is to be maintained, international civil servants must remain independent of any authority outside their organization; their conduct must reflect that independence. In keeping with their oath of office, they should not seek nor should they accept instructions from any Government, person or entity external to the organization. It cannot be too strongly stressed that international civil servants are not, in any sense, representatives of Governments or other entities, nor are they proponents of their policies. This applies equally to those on secondment from Governments and to those whose services have been made available from elsewhere. International civil servants should be constantly aware that through their allegiance to the Charter and the corresponding instruments of each organization, member States and their representatives are committed to respect this independent status.

9. Impartiality implies tolerance and restraint, particularly in dealing with political or religious convictions. While their personal views remain inviolate, international civil servants do not have the freedom of private persons to take sides or to express their convictions publicly on controversial matters, either individually or as members of a group. This can mean that, in certain situations, personal views should only be expressed with tact and discretion.

10. This does not mean that international civil servants have to give up their personal political views or national perspectives. It does mean, however, that they must at all times maintain a broad international outlook and an understanding of the international community as a whole.

11. The independence of the international civil service does not conflict with, or obscure, the fact that it is the member States that collectively make up (in some cases with other constituents) the organization. Conduct that furthers good relations with individual member States and that contributes to their trust and confidence in the secretariat strengthens the organization and promotes its interest.

12. International civil servants who are responsible for projects in particular countries or regions may be called upon to exercise special care in maintaining their independence. At times they might receive instructions from the host country but this should not compromise their independence. If at any time they consider that such instructions threaten their independence, they must consult their supervisors.

13. An international outlook stems from an understanding of and loyalty to the objectives and purposes of the international organization itself as set forth in its legal instruments. It implies, inter alia, respect for the right of others to hold different points of view and follow different cultural patterns. It requires a willingness to work without bias with persons of all nationalities, religions and cultures; it calls for constant sensitivity to how proposals, events and statements may look to others. It requires punctilious avoidance of any expressions that could be interpreted as biased or intolerant. Working methods can be different in different cultures. International civil servants should not be wedded to the attitudes, working methods or work habits of their own country or region.

14. Freedom from discrimination is a basic human right. International civil servants are expected to respect the dignity, worth and equality of all people without any distinction whatsoever. Assumptions based on stereotypes must be assiduously avoided. One of the main tenets of the Charter is the equality of men and women, and organizations should therefore do their utmost to promote gender equality.

2965

5592

Working relations

15. Managers and supervisors are in positions of leadership and it is their responsibility to ensure a harmonious workplace based on mutual respect; they should be open to all views and opinions and make sure that the merits of staff are properly recognized. They need to provide support to them; this is particularly important when they are subject to criticism arising from the carrying out of their duties. Managers are also responsible for guiding and motivating their staff and promoting their development.

16. It is natural for managers to be seen as role models and they have therefore a special obligation to uphold the highest standards of conduct. It would be quite improper for them to solicit favours, gifts or loans from their staff; they must act impartially, without intimidation and favouritism. In matters relating to the appointment or career of others, no international civil servant should try to influence colleagues for personal reasons.

17. It is naturally incumbent on managers and supervisors to communicate effectively with their staff and share information with them. International civil servants have a reciprocal responsibility to provide all pertinent facts and information to their supervisors and to abide by and defend any decisions taken, even when these do not accord with their personal views.

18. International civil servants have to follow the instructions they receive in connection with their official functions and if they have doubts as to whether an instruction is consistent with the Charter or any other constitutional instrument, decisions of the governing bodies or administrative rules and regulations, they should first consult their supervisors. If they cannot agree, the international civil servant may ask for written instructions. These may be challenged through the proper institutional mechanisms, but any challenge should not delay carrying out the instruction. International civil servants may also record their views in official files. They should not follow verbal or written instructions that are manifestly inconsistent with their official functions or that threaten their safety or that of others.

19. It must be the duty of international civil servants to report any breach of the organization's rules and regulations to a higher level official, whose responsibility it is to take appropriate action. An international civil servant who makes such a report in good faith has the right to be protected against reprisals or sanctions.

Harassment

20. Harassment in any shape or form is an affront to human dignity and international civil servants must avoid it. They should not engage in any form of harassment and must be above any suspicion of it. International civil servants have the right to an environment free of harassment. It is the responsibility of organizations to explain their interpretation of the term and to establish rules and provide guidance on what constitutes harassment and how it will be dealt with.

2966

5593

Conflict of interest

21. It can happen that international civil servants are confronted with a question entailing a conflict of interest; such questions can be very sensitive and need to be treated with care. Conflict of interest includes circumstances in which international civil servants, directly or indirectly, would appear to benefit improperly, or allow a third party to benefit improperly, from their association in the management or the holding of a financial interest in an enterprise that engages in any business or transaction with the organization.

22. There can be no question but that international civil servants should avoid assisting private bodies or persons in their dealings with their organization where this might lead to actual or perceived preferential treatment. This is particularly important in procurement matters or when negotiating prospective employment. At times, international civil servants may be required to disclose certain personal assets if this is necessary to enable their organizations to make sure that there is no conflict. They should also voluntarily disclose in advance possible conflicts of interest that arise in the course of carrying out their duties. They should perform their official duties and conduct their private affairs in a manner that preserves and enhances public confidence in their own integrity and that of their organization.

Role of the secretariat

23. International organizations are constituted by member States, and their secretariats have the responsibility for providing services to them. The main function of the secretariat is to assist legislative bodies in their work and to carry out their decisions. The executive head is responsible for directing and controlling the work of the secretariat. Accordingly, when submitting proposals or advocating positions before a legislative body or committee, international civil servants are presenting the position of the executive head, not that of an individual or unit.

24. In providing services to a legislative or representative body, it goes without saying that international civil servants should serve only the interests of the organization. It would not be appropriate for international civil servants to prepare for government or other international civil service representatives any speeches, arguments or proposals on questions under discussion. It could, however, be quite appropriate to provide factual information, technical advice or assistance with such tasks as the preparation of draft resolutions.

25. It is entirely improper for international civil servants to lobby or seek support from government representatives or members of legislative organs to obtain advancement either for themselves or for others or to block or reverse unfavourable decisions regarding their status. By adhering to the Charter and the constitutions of the organizations of the United Nations system, Governments have undertaken to safeguard the independence of the international civil service; it is therefore understood that government representatives and members of legislative bodies will neither accede to such requests nor intervene in such matters. The proper method for an international civil servant to address such matters is through administrative channels; each organization is responsible for providing these.

2967

5594

Staff management relations

26. Relations between management and staff should be guided by mutual respect. Elected staff representatives have a cardinal role to play in the consideration of conditions of employment and work, as well as in all matters of staff welfare. Freedom of association is a fundamental human right and international civil servants have the right to form and join associations, unions or other groupings to promote and defend their interests. Continuing dialogue between staff and management is indispensable. Management should facilitate this dialogue.

27. Elected staff representatives enjoy rights that derive from their status; this may include the opportunity to address legislative organs of their organization. These rights should be exercised in a manner that is consistent with the Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the international covenants on human rights and does not undermine the independence and integrity of the international civil service. In using the broad freedom of expression they enjoy, staff representatives must exercise a sense of responsibility and avoid undue criticism of the organization.

28. Staff representatives must be protected against discriminatory or prejudicial treatment based on their status or activities as staff representatives, both during their term of office and after it has ended.

Relations with member States and legislative bodies

29. It is the clear duty of all international civil servants to maintain the best possible relations with Governments and avoid any action which might impair this; they should certainly not interfere in the policies or affairs of Governments. It is unacceptable for them, either individually or collectively, to criticize or try to discredit a Government. At the same time, it is understood that international civil servants may speak freely in support of their organizations' policies. Any activity, direct or indirect, to undermine or overthrow a Government constitutes serious misconduct.

30. International civil servants are not representatives of their countries, nor do they have authority to act as liaison agents between international organizations and their Governments. The executive head may, however, request an international civil servant to undertake such duties, a unique role for which international loyalty and integrity are essential. For their part, neither Governments nor organizations should place international civil servants in a position where their international and national loyalties may conflict.

Relations with the public

31. For an international organization to function successfully, it must have the support of the public. All international civil servants therefore have a continuing responsibility to promote a better understanding of the objectives and work of their organizations. This requires them to be well informed of the achievements not only of their own organizations but of the United Nations system as a whole. The opportunity to provide information to the public can arise at any time.

2968

5595

32. There is a risk that on occasion international civil servants may be subject to criticism from outside their organizations; in keeping with their responsibility as international civil servants, they should respond with tact and restraint. They have the right to be defended by their organizations against criticism for actions taken in fulfilment of their duties and they should be confident that this will be done.

33. It would not be proper for international civil servants to air personal grievances or criticize their organizations in public. International civil servants should endeavour at all times to promote a positive image of the international civil service, in conformity with their oath of loyalty.

Relations with the media

34. Openness and transparency in relations with the media are effective means of communicating the organizations' messages, and the organizations should have guidelines and procedures for this purpose. Within that context, the following principles should apply: international civil servants should regard themselves as speaking in the name of their organizations and avoid personal references and views; in no circumstances should they use the media to further their own interests, to air their own grievances, to reveal unauthorized information or to attempt to influence policy decisions facing their organizations.

Use and protection of information

35. The disclosure of confidential information may seriously jeopardize the efficiency and credibility of an organization. International civil servants are responsible for exercising discretion in all matters of official business. They must not divulge confidential information without authorization. Nor should international civil servants use information that has not been made public and is known to them by virtue of their official position to private advantage. These are obligations that do not cease upon separation from service. It is necessary for organizations to maintain guidelines for the use and protection of confidential information, and it is equally necessary for such guidelines to keep pace with developments in communications technology. It is understood that these provisions do not affect established practices governing the exchange of information between the secretariats and member States, which ensure the fullest participation of member States in the life and work of the organizations.

Respect for different customs and culture

36. The world is home to a myriad of different peoples, languages, cultures, customs and traditions. It is self-evident that a genuine respect for them all is fundamental for an international civil servant. Any behaviour that is not acceptable in a particular cultural context must be avoided. However, if a tradition is directly contrary to any human rights instrument adopted by the United Nations system, the international civil servant must be guided by it. International civil servants should avoid an ostentatious lifestyle and any display of an inflated sense of personal importance.

2969

5596

Security and safety

37. While an executive head must remain free to assign staff in accordance with the exigencies of the service, it is the responsibility of organizations to make sure that the health, well-being and lives of their staff, without any discrimination whatsoever, will not be subject to undue risk. The organizations should take measures to protect their safety and that of their family members. On the other hand, it goes without saying that it is incumbent on international civil servants to comply with all instructions designed to protect their safety.

Personal conduct

38. The private life of international civil servants is their own concern and organizations should not intrude upon it. There can be situations, however, in which the behaviour of an international civil servant can reflect on the organization. International civil servants must therefore bear in mind that their conduct and activities outside the workplace, even if unrelated to official duties, can compromise the image and the interests of the organization. This can also result from the conduct of members of international civil servants' households and it is the responsibility of international civil servants to make sure that their households are fully aware of this.

39. The privileges and immunities that international civil servants enjoy are conferred upon them solely in the interests of the organizations. They do not exempt international civil servants from observing local laws, nor do they provide an excuse for ignoring private legal or financial obligations. It should be remembered that only the executive head is competent to waive the immunity accorded to international civil servants or to determine its scope.

40. Violations of law can range from serious criminal activities to trivial offences, and organizations may be called upon to exercise judgement in the light of the nature and circumstances of individual cases. A conviction by a national court will usually, although not always, be persuasive evidence of the act for which an international civil servant was prosecuted, and acts that are generally recognized as offences by national criminal laws will normally also be violations of the standards of conduct for the international civil service.

Outside employment and activities

41. The primary obligation of international civil servants is to devote their energies to the work of their organizations. It is therefore improper for international civil servants to engage, without prior authorization, in any outside activity, whether remunerated or not, that interferes with that obligation or is incompatible with their status or conflicts with the interests of the organization. Any questions about this should be referred to the executive head.

2970

5597

42. Subject to the above, outside activities may, of course, be beneficial both to staff members and to their organizations. Organizations should allow, encourage and facilitate the participation of international civil servants in professional activities that foster contacts with private and public bodies and thus serve to maintain and enhance their professional and technical competencies.

43. International civil servants on leave, whether with or without pay, should bear in mind that they remain international civil servants in the employ of their organization and are still subject to its rules. They may, therefore, only accept employment, paid or unpaid, during their leave with proper authorization.

44. In view of the independence and impartiality that they must maintain, international civil servants, while retaining the right to vote, should not participate in political activities, such as standing for or holding local or national political office. This does not, however, preclude participation in local community or civic activities, provided that such participation is consistent with the oath of service in the United Nations system. It is necessary for international civil servants to exercise discretion in their support for a political party or campaign, and they should not accept or solicit funds, write articles or make public speeches or make statements to the press. These cases require the exercise of judgement and, where there is any doubt, should be referred to the executive head.

45. The significance of membership in a political party varies from country to country and it is difficult to formulate standards that will apply in all cases. In general, international civil servants may be members of a political party provided its prevailing views and the obligations imposed on its members are consistent with the oath of service in the United Nations system.

Gifts, honours and remuneration from outside sources

46. To protect the international civil service from any appearance of impropriety, international civil servants must not accept, without authorization from the executive head, any honour, decoration, gift, remuneration, favour or economic benefit of more than nominal value from any source external to their organizations; it is understood that this includes Governments as well as commercial firms and other entities.

47. It is not proper for international civil servants to accept supplementary payments or other subsidies from a Government or any other source prior to, during or after their assignment with an international organization if the payment is related to that assignment. Balancing this requirement, it is understood that Governments or other entities should not make or offer such payments, recognizing that they are at variance with the spirit of the Charter and the constitutions of the organizations of the United Nations system.

Conclusion

48. The attainment of the standards of conduct for the international civil service requires the highest commitment of all parties. International civil servants must be committed to the values, principles and standards set forth here. They are expected to take a positive and active approach in upholding them. They should feel responsible for contributing to the broad ideals to which they dedicated themselves in joining the United Nations system. International organizations have a particular responsibility to ensure that the necessary guidance or rules are adopted to implement these standards. For their part, member States are expected, through their allegiance to the Charter and other constituent instruments, to preserve the independence and impartiality of the international civil service.

2971

5598

49. For these standards to be effectively applied, it is essential that they be widely disseminated, and that measures be taken to ensure that their scope and importance are understood throughout the international civil service, the member States and the organizations of the United Nations system.

50. Respect for these standards assures that the international civil service will continue to be an effective instrument in fulfilling its responsibilities and in meeting the aspirations of the peoples of the world.

2972

5599

Otto Triffterer

Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court

-Observers' Notes, Article by Article-

Second Edition

C.H. Beck · Hart · Nomos

5599

2973

5800

Published by Verlag C.H.Beck oHG, Wilhelmstraße 9, 80801 München, Germany, eMail: bestellung@beck.de

Co-published by Hart Publishing, 16C Worcester Place, Oxford, OX1 2JW, United Kingdom, eMail: hartpub.co.uk

and

Nomos Verlagsgesellschaft mbH & Co. KG, Waldseestraße 3-5,
76530 Baden-Baden, Germany, eMail: nomos@nomos.de

Published in North America (US and Canada) by Hart Publishing, c/o International Specialized Book Services, 930 NE 58th Avenue, Suite 300, Portland, OR 97213-3786, USA, eMail: orders@isbs.com

ISBN 978-3-406-57841-0 (Verlag C.H.Beck)
ISBN 978-1-84113-888-6 (Hart Publishing)
ISBN 978-3-8329-0927-7 (Nomos)

© 2008 Verlag C.H.Beck oHG
Wilhelmstr. 9, 80801 München

Printed in Germany by
Kösel GmbH & Co. KG,
Am Buchweg 1, 87452 Altusried-Krugzell

Typeset by the Editor

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, without the prior permission of Verlag C.H.Beck, or as expressly permitted by law under the terms agreed with the appropriate reprographic rights organisation. Enquiries concerning reproduction which may not be covered by the above should be addressed to Verlag C.H.Beck at the address above.

1. The notion and conc the Rome Statute separat appreciated and approve continue this line, famili the law to be applied in s and comment on crucia framework like a mosai aspects as well as with it necessarily lead to an acc help for all practitioners
Rome Statute and the juri

In order to preserve atmosphere at the Rome 17th July 1998, the expect of doubt or even opposi
Bassiouni) and the Introc notion and concern may first activities of the Cour homepage of the ICC ww

2. The Second Edition w
First. The jurisprudence international" or national literature since 1999, and, the case Prosecutor v. Tho

Meanwhile the "Eleme adopted by the Assembly by the Judges on 27 May the day to day practice of they can be a valuable gui at hand directly when usin in the original version th
Website in the Official Jo Regulations of the Court, than those not reprinted h four sources of law menti article 21 para. 1 (a) Rom
"assist the Court in the i priority. Of course, the El those Articles of the Rom be commented in the same

1 The trial against Thomas Trial Chamber took place OF THE COALITION FOR cpi.int/cases/RDC/c0106.1
Chamber, see www.icc-cp

2974

5601

Article 25
Individual criminal responsibility

1. The Court shall have jurisdiction over natural persons pursuant to this Statute.

2. A person who commits a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court shall be individually responsible and liable for punishment in accordance with this Statute.

3. In accordance with this Statute, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court if that person:

(a) Commits such a crime, whether as an individual, jointly with another or through another person, regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible;

(b) Orders, solicits or induces the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted;

(c) For the purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime, aids, abets or otherwise assists in its commission or its attempted commission, including providing the means for its commission;

(d) In any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose. Such contribution shall be intentional and shall either:

(i) Be made with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group, where such activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; or

(ii) Be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime;

(e) In respect of the crime of genocide, directly and publicly incites others to commit genocide;

(f) Attempts to commit such a crime by taking action that commences its execution by means of a substantial step, but the crime does not occur because of circumstances independent of the person's intentions. However, a person who abandons the effort to commit the crime or otherwise prevents the completion of the crime shall not be liable for punishment under this Statute for the attempt to commit that crime if that person completely and voluntarily gave up the criminal purpose.

4. No provision in this Statute relating to individual criminal responsibility shall affect the responsibility of States under international law.

Literature:

Kai Ambos, DER ALLGEMEINE TEIL DES VÖLKERSTRAFRECHTS. ANSÄTZE EINER DOGMATISIERUNG (2002/2004²); id., LA PARTE GENERAL DEL DERECHO PENAL INTERNACIONAL (2005); id., Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Criminal Law, in: Gabrielle K. McDonald/Olivia Swaak Goldman (eds.), SUBSTANTIVE AND PROCEDURAL ASPECTS OF INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW, Vol. I: COMMENTARY I (2000); id., General Principles of Criminal Law in the Rome Statute, 9 CRIM. L.F. 1 (1999); id., "Verbrechenselemente" sowie Verfahrens- und Beweisregeln des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs, 54 NJW 405 (2001); id., Superior Responsibility (Art. 28), in: Antonio Cassese et al. (eds.), THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: A COMMENTARY 805 (2002); id., Some Preliminary Reflections on the Mens Rea Requirements of the Crimes of the ICC-Statute and of the Elements of Crimes, in: Lal Chand Vorah et al. (eds.), MAN'S INHUMANITY TO MAN – ESSAYS IN HONOUR OF A. CASSESE 11 (2003); id., Zwischenbilanz im Milosevic-Verfahren, 59 JURISTENZEITUNG 965 (2004); M. Cherif. Bassiouni, INTRODUCTION TO INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW (2003); Antonio Cassese, INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW 135 (2003); Albin Eser, Individual Criminal Responsibility (Art. 25), in: Antonio Cassese et al. (eds.), THE ROME STATUTE OF THE ICC: A COMMENTARY 767 (2002); Christopher Greenwood, Command responsibility and the Hadzihasanovic decision, 2 J. INT'L CRIM. JUST. 598 (2004); Kai Hamdorf, BETEILIGUNGSMODELLE IM STRAFRECHT. EIN VERGLEICH VON TEILNAHME- UND EINHEITSTÄTERSYSTEMEN IN SKANDINAVIEN, ÖSTERREICH UND DEUTSCHLAND (2002); Claus Kreß, Die Kristallisation eines Allgemeinen Teils des Völkerstrafrechts: Die Allgemeinen Prinzipien des Strafrechts im Statut des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs, 12 HUMANITÄRES VÖLKERRECHT 4 (1999); Ferrando Mantovani, The General Principles of International Criminal Law: The viewpoint of a national criminal lawyer, 1 J. INT'L CRIM.

2975

S602

β) "For the purpose of facilitating"

This concept introduces a subjective threshold which goes beyond the ordinary mens rea requirement within the meaning of article 30[113]. The expression "for the purpose of facilitating" is borrowed from the Model Penal Code. While the necessity of this requirement was controversial within the American Law Institute, it is clear that purpose generally implies a specific subjective requirement stricter than mere knowledge[114]. The formula, therefore, ignores the – above quoted – jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR, since this jurisprudence holds that the aider and abetter must only know that his or her acts will assist the principal in the commission of an offence[115]. Additionally, knowledge may be inferred from all relevant circumstances[116], i.e., it may be proven by circumstantial evidence[117]. 23

On the other hand, the word "facilitating" confirms that a direct and substantial assistance is not necessary and that the act of assistance need not be a conditio sine qua non of the crime[118].

In conclusion, the formulation confirms the general assessment that subparagraph (c) provides for a relatively low objective but relatively high subjective threshold (in any case higher than the ordinary mens rea requirement according to article 30)[119].

(d) "In any other way contributes" to the (attempted) commission ... "by a group ... acting with a common purpose"

The whole subparagraph (d) is an almost literal copy of a 1998 Anti-terrorism convention[120] and presents a compromise with earlier "conspiracy" provisions[121], which since Nuremberg have been controversial[122]. The 1991 ILC Draft Code held punishable an individual who "conspires 24

---

113 See D. K. Piragoff, article 30, margin Nos. 9 et seq. and 17 et seq.; generally about the mental element in international criminal law, c. f. A. Eser, Mental Elements – Mistake of Fact and Law, in: A. Cassese et al. (eds.), THE ROME STATUTE OF THE ICC: A COMMENTARY 889 (2002); K. Ambos, Some Preliminary Reflections on the Mens Rea Requirements of the Crimes of the ICC-Statute and of the Elements of Crimes, in: L. C. Vohrah et al. (eds.), MAN'S INHUMANITY TO MAN – ESSAYS IN HONOUR OF A. CASSESE 12 et seq. (2003); supra note 2, id., DER ALLGEMEINE TEIL 757 et seq.; supra note 2, O. Triffterer, Bestandsaufnahme 22 f.–4.

114 Supra note 17, Model Penal Code, § 2.06. Conc. supra note 6, A. Eser, Responsibility 801.

115 Supra note 81, Prosecutor v. Tadic, para. 692; supra note 72, Prosecutor v. Delalic et al., paras. 326, 328; supra note 88, Prosecutor v. Furundzija, paras. 236–249 (236, 245–6, 249); supra note 19, Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, para. 90; Prosecutor v. Vasiljevic, Case No. IT-98-32-A, Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 25 Feb. 2004, para. 102; supra note 98, Prosecutor v. Blaskic, Case No. IT-95-14-A, para. 49; supra note 71, Prosecutor v. Akayesu, paras. 476–9; supra note 103, Prosecutor v. Semanza, Case No. ICTR-97-20-T, para. 388; supra note 103, Prosecutor v. Kamuhanda, Case No. ICTR-95-54A-T, para. 599.

116 Supra note 81, Prosecutor v. Tadic, para. 676; supra note 72, Prosecutor v. Delalic et al., para. 328; supra note 71, Prosecutor v. Akayesu, para. 478; supra note 103, Prosecutor v. Kamuhanda, Case No. ICTR-95-54A-T, para. 600.

117 C. f. supra note 81, Prosecutor v. Tadic, para. 689: "if the presence can be shown or inferred, by circumstantial or other evidence, to be knowing ..."; supra note 72, Prosecutor v. Delalic et al., para. 386 with regard to command responsibility: "... such knowledge cannot be presumed but must be established by way of circumstantial evidence".

118 Supra note 88, Prosecutor v. Furundzija, para. 231.

119 Conc. supra note 6, A. Eser, Responsibility 801 with fn. 145.

120 International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, U.N. Doc. A/RES/52/164 (1998), Annex (37 I.L.M. 249 (1998)), article 2 para. 3 (c).

121 For example: Preparatory Committee Draft, article 23 para. 7 (c) (ii).

122 See, for example, V. Pella, Mémorandum, 2 Y.B.I.L.C. 278–362, 357 (1950); J. Graven, Les Crimes contre l'Humanité, RECUEIL DES COURS DE L'ACADÉMIE DE DROIT INTERNATIONAL 433–605, 502–503 (1950); H.-H. Jescheck, Die internationale Genocidium-Konvention vom 9. Dezember 1948 und die Lehre vom Völkerstrafrecht, 66 ZStW 193–217, 213 (1954); R. Rayfuse, The Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind: Eating Disorders at the International Law Commission, 8 CRIM. L.F. 52 (1997); supra note 27, A. Cassese, INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW 196 et seq. See also the statement of the German delegate O. Katholnigg at the Diplomatic Conference for the Adoption of the 1988 Drug Convention (United Nations Conference for the Adoption of a Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, Vienna, 1988, Official Records, Vol. II, para. 52: "common law concept unknown in civil law systems"). The concept was, however, in principle recognized by the ILC Special Rapporteur D. Thiam (2 Y.B.I.L.C., Part 1, 16, para. 66 (1990)) and also exists today in civil law jurisdictions in a similar

2976

5603

Principles of Criminal Law

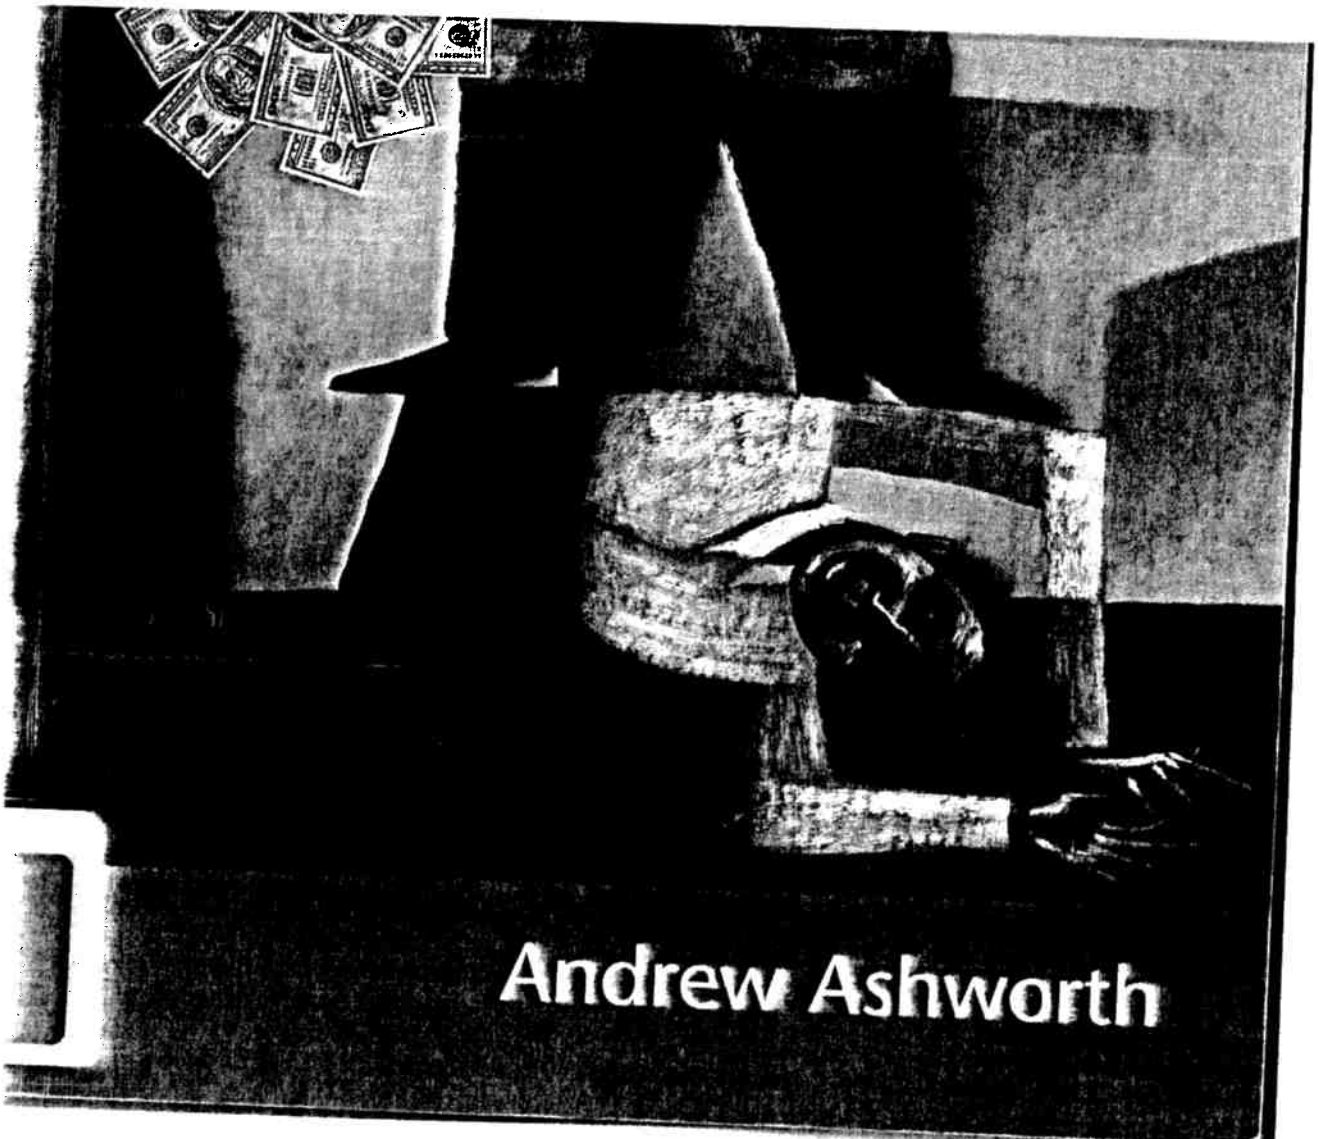
OXFORD



Andrew Ashworth

2977 5604

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Great Clarendon Street, Oxford OX2 6DP

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship,
and education by publishing worldwide in

Oxford New York

Auckland Cape Town Dar es Salaam Hong Kong Karachi
Kuala Lumpur Madrid Melbourne Mexico City Nairobi
New Delhi Shanghai Taipei Toronto

With offices in

Argentina Austria Brazil Chile Czech Republic France Greece
Guatemala Hungary Italy Japan Poland Portugal Singapore
South Korea Switzerland Thailand Turkey Ukraine Vietnam

Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press
in the UK and in certain other countries

Published in the United States

The moral rights of the author have been asserted
Database right Oxford University Press (maker)

Crown copyright material is reproduced under Class Licence
Number C01P0000148 with the permission of OPSI
and the Queen's Printer for Scotland

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means,
without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press, or as expressly permitted by law, or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department,
Oxford University Press, at the address above

You must not circulate this book in any other binding or cover and you must impose this same condition on any acquirer

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Data available

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Data available

Typeset by RefineCatch Limited, Bungay, Suffolk Printed in Great Britain
on acid-free paper by Ashford Colour Press Ltd., Gosport, Hants.

ISBN 0-19-928114-9 978-0-19-928114-5

1 3 5 7 9 10 8 6 4 2

2978

5865

10.3 THE CONDUCT ELEMENT IN COMPLICITY

We have seen that the 1861 Act refers to those who 'aid, abet, counsel or procure' a crime. As a matter of history, it seems that this Act was intended only to declare the procedure whereby accomplices could be convicted and sentenced as principals, and not to provide a definition of complicity. Earlier statutes had used a wide range of terms—contriving, helping, maintaining, directing—and the wording of the 1861 Act was probably intended merely as a general reference to the existing common law on accomplices. However, the words have taken on an authority of their own. In 1976 the Court of Appeal declared that each of the four verbs should be given its ordinary meaning,[18] but, as we shall see, there are several decisions on the scope of the four terms. One factor that formerly had considerable importance was presence during the commission of the crime. So long as the other conditions for liability were fulfilled, presence turned the accomplice into an aider or abettor, absence into a counsellor or counsellor, or procurer seems to depend partly on ordinary language and partly on specific judicial decisions.

(a) AIDING AND ABETTING

It has been traditional to consider the modes of complicity in terms of the two time-honoured pairings: 'aid or abet', and 'counsel or procure'. In fact, the concept of abetment seems to play no independent role now. Abetting involves some encouragement of the principal to commit the offence and this usually accompanies, or is implicit in, an act of aiding. Aid may be given by supplying an instrument to the principal, keeping a look-out, doing preparatory acts, and many other forms of assistance given before or at the time of the offence. The disappearance of the old requirement of presence may be illustrated by two cases. In Bainbridge (1959)[21] a man who provided equipment for use in a burglary was treated as a counsellor and procurer, because the burglary was to take place some days hence, whereas it would now be more natural to refer to him as an aider since he gave assistance by supplying the equipment. In Attorney General v Able (1984)[22] the discussion of D's criminal liability for supplying a booklet explaining various ways of committing suicide was conducted on the basis that this would be aiding and abetting, whereas in former times this would have been regarded as counselling, since the author of the book was not present at the suicides.

[18] Attorney-General's Reference (No. 1 of 1975) [1975] QB 773.
[19] See e.g. Lord Goddard CJ in Ferguson v Weaving [1951] 1 KB 814, and generally J. C. Smith, 'Aid, Abet, Counsel or Procure', in P. R. Glazebrook (ed.) Reshaping the Criminal Law (1978).
[20] Howe [1987] AC 417, overruling Richards [1974] QB 776.
[21] [1960] 1 QB 129.
[22] [1984] 1 QB 795.

2979

5866

Once it has been shown that the accomplice's conduct helped or might have helped the principal in some way, it does not have to be established that the accomplice caused the principal's offence. Causation requirements often function so as to fix the threshold of legal liability. However, one cannot, in general, trace causal responsibility through the voluntary act of another person[24]—so it will not usually be possible to hold that an accomplice caused the principal to act, save in a rather diluted form of 'causing'.[25] Sanford Kadish has argued that the law does require a form of causation: the courts must be satisfied that the accomplice's help might have made a difference to whether the principal's offence was actually committed, in the sense that one could not be sure that it would have been committed but for the accomplice's assistance.[26] However, it is not easy to reconcile all decisions with this approach. Thus in Wilcox v Jeffery (1951) a jazz enthusiast attended a concert, applauding the decision of an American jazz musician to give an illegal performance. No point was taken in court about whether the musician was actually encouraged by the defendant's acts.[27] Indeed, in cases where several people applaud or encourage Giannetto[24] the Court of Appeal stated that 'any involvement from mere encouragement upwards would suffice', and did not dissent from the trial judge's suggestion that, if another man had said to D that he was about to kill D's wife, 'as little as patting him on the back, nodding, saying "Oh goody" ' would be sufficient to turn D into an aider and abettor. Since this example involves a principal who has already decided to commit the offence, the accomplice's contribution can hardly be said to make a causal difference.

Another type of situation occurs where the principal is unaware of the help given by the secondary party. In the famous American case of State v Tally (1894),[28] Judge Tally, knowing that his brothers-in-law had set out to kill the deceased, and knowing that someone else had sent a telegram to warn the victim, sent a telegram to the telegraph operator telling him not to deliver the warning telegram. The telegraph operator complied, and the brothers-in-law committed the offence. The judge was convicted of aiding and abetting murder, even though the brothers-in-law were unaware of the judge's assistance when they killed the victim. It could be said that there was a causal connection in this case, but surely it should have been enough that the judge's act was more than minimal and he intended to aid. The law might deal more satisfactorily with these cases if it included a general offence of assisting or encouraging crime, discussed in section 10.8 below.

[24] See above, Ch 4.6(a) and (b).
[25] Cf. H. L. A. Hart and T. Honoré, Causation in the Law (2nd edn., 1985), 388.
[26] S. Kadish, Blame and Punishment (1987), 162. [27] [1951] 1 All ER 464.
[24] [1997] 1 Cr App R 1, at 13. [28] State v Tally (1894) 15 So 722.

2980

5607

(b) ACCOMPLICE LIABILITY AND SOCIAL DUTIES

We saw in Chapter 4.4 how accomplice liability has been used in English law to establish criminal liability for certain omissions, and the relevant authorities must now be considered in the context of complicity. The cases raise issues of constitutional and social importance, but the key question in accessorial liability is simple to state: can a person be convicted as an accomplice merely for standing by and doing nothing while an offence is being committed?

If mere presence at the scene during the principal's offence were sufficient for accomplice liability, this would amount to recognizing a citizen's duty either to leave straight away or to take reasonable steps to prevent or frustrate any offence which is witnessed. The courts have held that non-accidental presence, such as attending a fight or an unlawful theatrical performance, is not conclusive evidence of aiding and abetting.[29] At a minimum there must be an act of encouragement (accompanied by an intention to encourage, discussed in section 10.4 below). Some judgments suggest the jury or magistrates. The finding of an act of encouragement may require more than going to the place where the performance is taking place, but payment and applause may suffice;[31] however, in one case it was held that remaining in a vehicle that was being used to obstruct the police, in circumstances showing that D supported the actions of the driver, might amount to aiding.[32] The position of spectators who happen upon an illegal fight or event and stay to watch it is similar: simply sitting or standing nearby is unlikely to be sufficient for liability, but any cheering or applause would probably tip the balance in favour of conviction. The problems are particularly acute in cases of public disorder. To impose duties on bystanders, even the duty to move away, might be regarded as an incursion on a citizen's right to freedom of assembly (declared in Article 11 of the European Convention). What must be proved, to amount to aiding and abetting one of the offences in the Public Order Act, is that D was present, was giving encouragement, and was intending to encourage others to commit the specified offence.[33] Mere presence should not be sufficient, particularly in view of Article 11.

Are there arguments in favour of the law going further and imposing a duty to take steps to prevent crime? The public disorder example may be complicated by the impotence of individuals to do anything to stop the disturbance and, indeed, the imprudence of their trying to do so. But is it not arguable that there should be at least a duty to alert the police? If so, should failure to do so constitute a distinct [29] Coney (1882) 8 QBD 534. [30] Hawkins J in ibid., and Clarkson [1971] 1 WLR 1402.

[31] Wilcox v Jeffery [1951] 1 All ER 464.
[32] Smith v Reynolds et al. [1986] Crim LR 559; for another decision based on voluntary presence, see O'Flaherty [2004] Crim LR 751.
[33] Jefferson et al. (1994) 99 Cr App R 13, at 22; for a summary of the main public order offences, see Ch 8.3(h) above.

2981

offence (as in French law[34]) or complicity in the public disorder? Another example, which does not involve public disorder, occurs where a woman is living with a man who she discovers is dealing in drugs. If the police raid the dwelling and find drugs on the premises, should the law treat her as an accomplice even if there is no evidence of active assistance or encouragement of the drug-dealing? In the case of Bland (1988)[35] the Court of Appeal quashed the woman's conviction as an accomplice. Cases such as this demonstrate a vivid conflict between individuals' rights of privacy in their personal relationships and the social interest in suppressing serious crime. Would it be right for the law to co-opt husbands against wives, parents against children, house-sharing friends against friends in order to increase public protection?[36]

Probably the only way to answer this question is to balance the relative centrality of the right against the seriousness of the offence involved—not a simple exercise, but an inevitable one if the true nature of the problem is to be confronted. The same applies to the situation in Clarkson (1971):[37] two soldiers happened to enter a room where other soldiers were raping a woman. It was not found that they did anything other because the judge had not made it clear that there should be proof of both an intent to encourage and actual encouragement. Nothing was said about a duty to alert the authorities immediately in the hope of preventing the crime's continuance. What if three persons came upon one man raping a woman? If it was within their power to put a stop to the offence and to apprehend the offender, should they have a duty to do so—or at least a duty to inform the police? The practical possibilities will vary from case to case, but the real issue is whether there is to be a principle that citizens ought to take reasonable steps to inform the police when they witness an offence. The decision in Allan (1965)[38] is against this, emphasizing the requirement of encouragement and adding that, even if D would have joined in if necessary, it would be unacceptable 'to convict a man on his thoughts, unaccompanied by any physical act other than the facts of mere presence'. However, variations in the facts of cases could be accommodated by requiring the citizen only to take 'reasonable steps',[39] and no law should require a person to place his or her own safety in jeopardy. Even if this were accepted, there would remain the question whether it is fairer to convict the defaulting citizen of a new offence of failing to inform the police rather than making the citizen into an accomplice to the principal crime. The former is surely more appropriate in terms of fair labelling.

[34] Art. 223(1) of the French Penal Code, discussed by A. Ashworth and E. Steiner, 'Criminal Omissions and Public Duties: the French Experience' (1990) 10 Legal Studies 153.

[35] [1988] Crim LR 41; cf. also Bradbury [1996] Crim LR 808.

[36] Cf. s. 80 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which makes a husband or wife (but not a non-spouse) compellable as a witness on a charge of violence towards a child under 16 in the household.

[37] [1971] 1 WLR 1402.

[38] [1965] 1 QB 130; see further G. Williams, 'Criminal Omissions—the Conventional View' (1990) 107 LQR 86.

[39] See n 34 above.

5609

Can a person be said to aid an offence by an omission?[40] There would surely be no awkwardness in describing the cleaner of a bank who, in pursuance of an agreed plan, purposely omits to lock the doors when leaving as 'aiding' a burglary of the bank. In such a case, there is a clear duty and a failure to perform it, and the causation question is answered (in so far as it is relevant to aiding) in the same way as for omissions generally.[41] Another example would be the driving instructor who is supervising a learner driver and who realizes that the learner is about to undertake a manœuvre which is dangerous to other road-users: if, as in Rubie v Faulkner (1940),[42] the instructor fails to intervene, either by telling the learner not to do it or by physically acting to prevent it, then this failure in the duty of supervision is rightly held to be sufficient to support liability for aiding and abetting the learner driver's offence.

From these cases of duty we turn to cases of legal power, and the so-called 'control principle'. The owner of a car who is a passenger when the car is being driven by another has the legal power to direct this other person not to drive in certain ways;[43] the licensee of a public house has the legal power to require customers to the courts have held the car owner and the licensee liable as accomplices to the crime of the offender who drives carelessly or remains drinking after hours. What is unusual about these cases is that they rest on the legal power of control of, respectively, the car owner and the licensee and not, like Rubie v Faulkner above, on the existence of a legal duty to ensure compliance with the law. A similar analysis is found in J.F. Alford Transport Ltd (1997),[45] where the company's convictions for aiding and abetting drivers to falsify their tachograph records were quashed. If the prosecution had proved the power of control, knowledge, and encouragement by non-intervention, that would have been sufficient. But this case, unlike the previous two, did not involve D's presence during the commission of the offences; and knowledge, or wilful blindness, was held not to have been established. However, the control principle was reasserted, and that principle departs from the usual approach of not imposing liability for an omission unless a clear duty exists.[46] What the courts have done, in effect, is to assimilate these cases of 'power of control' to cases of duty, thereby creating a new class of public duty.[47] Even though English law does not impose liability for failing to take reasonable steps to prevent an offence which occurs in the street, these cases hold that a property owner will be liable for failing to take [40] K. J. M. Smith, Modern Treatise on Complicity, 39–47. [41] See above, Ch 4.6(c).

[42] [1940] 1 KB 571, discussed by M. Wasik, 'A Learner's Careless Driving' [1982] Crim LR 411, and D. J. Lanham, 'Drivers, Control and Accomplices' [1982] Crim LR 419.

[43] Du Cros v Lambourne [1907] 1 KB 40. [44] Tuck v Robson [1970] 1 WLR 741.

[45] [1997] 2 Cr App R 326.

[46] The Law Commission's view was that the breach of duty must also have actually amounted to assistance or encouragement (Law Commission Consultation Paper No. 131, Assisting and Encouraging Crime (1993), para. 2.29), but the decisions seem to regard this requirement as easily fulfilled.

[47] Cf. the debate between G. Williams, 'Which of You Did It?' (1989) 52 MLR 179 and D. J. Lanham, 'Three Cases of Accessorial Absurdity' (1990) 53 MLR 75.

2983

reasonable steps to prevent an offence which occurs on or with that property (and with the owner's knowledge). The law has, in effect, co-opted property owners as law-enforcement agents in respect of their own property, and J.E. Alford Transport provides for employers to be co-opted in respect of their employees' conduct at work.

Does it amount to aiding if a shopkeeper sells an item to P knowing that P intends to use it in a crime, or if a borrower returns an article to its owner knowing that the owner intends to use it in crime? These could be said to be acts of assistance, in the sense that the physical conduct of selling or returning goods helps an offender: should they, if accompanied by the required mental element, amount to aiding the principal? The problem is that both acts are 'normal': the shopkeeper is simply selling goods in the normal course of business, and the borrower is merely fulfilling a duty to restore the goods to their owner. If the law were to regard either of these acts as 'aiding', it would be requiring the defendants to do something abnormal in the circumstances, and—in effect—punishing them for the omission to do the abnormal thing.

another a gun to be used for murdering a third, he may be indifferent whether the third man lives or dies and interested only in the cash profit to be made out of the sale, but he can still be an aider or abettor'.[48] This view criminalizes the shopkeeper as an accomplice in every case where the customer's intention to commit that kind of offence is known. Criminal liability might be justified by arguing that a small sacrifice is properly required of shopkeepers in order to benefit the potential victims of crime. Surely, where an offence against the person is a possibility, it is right to place the potential victim's right not to be subjected to assault or injury above the shopkeeper's liberty to sell to all-comers. After all, the shopkeeper is not being required to intervene or even to notify the police of the customer's intentions. The requirement is not to sell goods when the customer is known to be bent on crime.

Despite the decision in Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority (1986),[49] the statement in NCB v Gamble that selling goods in the ordinary course of business can satisfy the conduct element of 'aiding' remains good law. But, as we will see in section 10.4 below, there is also support for a second approach, long upheld in many American jurisdictions, namely, that a shopkeeper should be liable as an accomplice only where it was his or her purpose to further the customer's offence.[50] This stresses the notions of free trade and individual autonomy, treating the shopkeeper as a mere trader rather than as a fellow citizen's keeper. A third approach would not involve the law of complicity, but would treat the shopkeeper's liability as a matter of general criminal law—either by creating a special offence of selling goods [48] NCB v Gamble [1959] 1 QB 11.

[49] Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority [1986] AC 112, criticized in Ch 4.9(b) and Ch 5.2(b)(ii) above, and discussed in detail at pp. 424–5 below.

[50] Model Penal Code, s. 2.06(3); see also the reasoning of Glanville Williams, Criminal Law: the General Part (2nd edn., 1961), sect. 124.

S601

which are likely to be used in the commission of crime (of which there are some examples now, such as the sale of knives) or through a general offence of facilitating crime.

Is there a material difference where someone who has borrowed goods is asked by the owner to return them so that they may be used for a crime? In NCB v Gamble it was held by Devlin J that returning goods in these circumstances is a 'negative act' rather than a 'positive act': 'a man who hands over to another his own property on demand, although he may physically be performing a positive act, in law is only refraining from detinue'.[51] To invent a distinction between 'positive' and 'negative' acts in order to exempt a borrower who returns goods is unconvincing. In one sense the case is weaker than that of the shopkeeper, since the borrower has a duty to return goods to their owner, whereas a shopkeeper has no duty to sell; but in another sense it is just as strong, since a court would be reluctant to find the borrower liable in tort for failing to return goods in such circumstances, and would be more likely to recognize a defence based on the prevention of crime. Devlin J's analysis, despite the fragility of gun which is then to be used for killing someone. The potential victim's rights must count for more than the borrower's duty to return goods to their owner. Rather than concealing these conflicts behind Devlin J's unconvincing analysis, a preferable course would be either to allow a defence of 'balance of evils' to any apparently criminal complicity,[52] or to state that D should not be liable for returning property to its owner unless D shares the owner's criminal purpose or unless a crime of violence is known to be in contemplation.[53]

(c) COUNSELLING AND PROCURING

The characteristic contribution of the counsellor or procurer is to incite, instigate, or advise on the commission of the substantive offence by the principal. One way of expressing this is to describe the role as 'encouraging' the perpetrator. Some European legal systems provide a higher maximum penalty for an accomplice who incites or instigates than for a mere helper, and a general justification for this can readily be found. No offence might have taken place at all but for the instigation, and this is surely more reprehensible than assisting someone who has already decided to commit a crime. In practice, however, there are many shades of culpability between helpers and instigators, a point which strikes the English lawyer more forcefully because of the uncertain limits of the terms 'counselling' and 'procuring'. The ordinary meaning of 'counselling' may fall well short of inciting or instigating an offence, and covers such [51] [1959] 1 QB 11, at 20, discussing Lomas (1913) 9 Cr App R 220. [52] See above, Ch 4.8.

[53] G. Williams, 'Obedience to Law as a Crime' (1990) 53 MLR 445; an alternative advanced by G. R. Sullivan, 'The Law Commission Consultation Paper on Complicity: Fault Elements and Joint Enterprise' [1994] Crim LR 252, is to exempt crimes triable only on indictment.

2985

5612

INTERNATIONAL AND COMPARATIVE CRIMINAL LAW SERIES

VOLUME 2

THE LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: An Article-by-Article Evolution of the Statute

M. CHERIF BASSIOUNI

Transnational Publishers

2986

5613

Published and distributed by Transnational Publishers, Inc.
Ardsley Park Science and Technology Center
410 Saw Mill River Road
Ardsley, NY 10502

Phone: 914–693–5100
Fax: 914–693–4430
E-mail: info@transnationalpubs.com
Web: www.transnationalpubs.com

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

The legislative history of the International Criminal Court / [edited by] M. Ch
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 1–57105–156–2 (3 vol. set)
1. International Criminal Court—History. 2. International criminal courts—history. I. Bassiouni, M. Cherif, 1937–

KZ6312.L44 2005
345'.01—dc22

2004063656

Copyright © 2005 by Transnational Publishers, Inc.

All rights reserved. This book may not be reproduced, in whole or in part, in (beyond that copying permitted by U.S. Copyright Law in Section 107, "fair u teaching and research, Section 108, certain library copying, and except in put by reviewers in limited excerpts), without written permission from the publish

Manufactured in the United States of America

2987

[2. If the law as it appeared at the commission of the crime is amended prior to the final judgement in the case, the most lenient law shall be applied.][166]

ZUTPHEN DRAFT

S614

Article 16[A bis][167]

Non-retroactivity

1. Provided that this Statute is applicable in accordance with article 15[A], a person shall not be criminally responsible under this Statute for conduct committed prior to its entry into force.

[2. If the law as it appeared at the commission of the crime is amended prior to the final judgement in the case, the most lenient law shall be applied.][168]

~~Other proposals that may also relate to, inter alia, issues concerning trigger mechanism and other jurisdictional questions respectively, and which will be debated by the Preparatory Committee at a later session~~

~~[When a State becomes a party to this Statute after its entry into force, the Court has jurisdiction only in respect of acts committed by its nationals or on its territory or against its nationals after the deposit by that State of its instrument of ratification or accession. A non-party State may, however, by an express declaration deposited with the Registrar of the Court, agree that the Court has jurisdiction in respect of the acts that it specifies in the declaration.~~

~~The Court has no jurisdiction in respect of crimes for which, even if they have been committed after the entry into force of this Statute, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, has decided before the entry into force of this Statute to establish an ad hoc international criminal tribunal. The Security Council may, however, decide otherwise.]~~

~~[The present Statute shall apply only to acts committed in the territory of a State party to the present Statute or by the nationals of a State party to the present Statute or against the nationals of a State party to the present Statute.]~~

N.B.: Other proposals under paragraph 2 could be deleted because the issues with which they dealt are covered under articles 7[21 bis] (Preconditions to the exercise of jurisdiction), 8[21 ter] (Temporal jurisdiction) and 9[22] (Acceptance of the jurisdiction of the Court).

---

[166] This provision raises issues relating to non-retroactivity, amendment of the Statute and penalties. Accordingly, further consideration of this issue is required.

[167] Ibid., pp. 19-20.

[168] This provision raises issues relating to non-retroactivity, amendment of the statute and penalties. Accordingly, further consideration of this issue is required.

DECISIONS TAKEN BY THE PREPARATORY COMMITTEE AT ITS SESSION HELD 11 TO 21 FEBRUARY 1997

Article A bis

Non-retroactivity

1. Provided that this Statute is applicable in accordance with article A, a person shall not be criminally responsible under this Statute for conduct committed prior to its entry into force.

[2. If the law as it appeared at the commission of the crime is amended prior to the final judgement in the case, the most lenient law shall be applied.]

Other proposals that may also relate to, inter alia, issues concerning trigger mechanism and other jurisdictional questions respectively, and which will be debated by the Preparatory Committee at a later session

[When a State becomes a party to this Statute after its entry into force, the Court has jurisdiction only in respect of acts committed by its nationals or on its territory or against its nationals after the deposit by that State of its instrument of ratification or accession. A non-party State may, however, by an express declaration deposited with the Registrar of the Court, agree that the Court has jurisdiction in respect of the acts that it specifies in the declaration.

The Court has no jurisdiction in respect of crimes for which, even if they have been committed after the entry into force of this Statute, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, has decided before the entry into force of this Statute to establish an ad hoc international criminal tribunal. The Security Council may, however, decide otherwise.]

[The present Statute shall apply only to acts committed in the territory of a State party to the present Statute or by the nationals of a State party to the present Statute or against the nationals of a State party to the present Statute.]

AD HOC COMMITTEE

28. Some delegations favoured the inclusion of a provision on the non-retroactivity of the statute, bearing in mind article 28 of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.

ARTICLE 25
INDIVIDUAL CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY

ROME STATUTE

Article 25

Individual criminal responsibility

1. The Court shall have jurisdiction over natural persons pursuant to this Statute.

2484

2. A person who comtnits a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court shall be individually responsible and liable for punishment in accordance with this Statute.
3. In accordance with this Statute, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court if that person:

(a) Commits such a crime, whether as an individual, jointly with another or through another person, regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible;

(b) Orders, solicits or induces the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted;

(c) For the purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime, aids, abets or otherwise assists in its commission or its attempted commission, including providing the means for its commission;

(d) In any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose. Such contribution shall be intentional and shall either:

(i) Be made with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group, where such activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; or

(ii) Be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime;

(e) In respect of the crime of genocide, directly and publicly incites others to commit genocide;

(f) Attempts to commit such a crime by taking action that commences its execution by means of a substantial step, but the crime does not occur because of circumstances independent of the person's intentions. However, a person who abandons the effort to commit the crime or otherwise prevents the completion of the crime shall not be liable for punishment under this Statute for the attempt to commit that crime if that person completely and voluntarily gave up the criminal purpose.

4. No provision in this Statute relating to individual criminal responsibility shall affect the responsibility of States under international law.

Text Transmitted by Drafting Committee to Committee of the Whole

Article 23

Individual criminal responsibility

1. The Court shall have jurisdiction over natural persons pursuant to this Statute.
2. A person who commits a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court shall be individually responsible and liable for punishment in accordance with this Statute.
3. In accordance with this Statute, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court if that person:

(a) Commits such a crime, whether as an individual, jointly with another or through another person, regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible;

(b) Orders, solicits or induces the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted;

(c) For the purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime, aids, abets or otherwise assists in its commission or its attempted commission, including providing the means for its commission;

(d) In any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose.
Such contribution shall be intentional and shall either:

(i.) Be made with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group, where such activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; or

(ii.) Be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime;

(e) In respect of the crime of genocide, directly and publicly incites others to commit genocide;

(f) Attempts to commit such a crime by taking action that commences its execution by means of a substantial step, but the crime does not occur because of circumstances independent of the person's intentions. However, a person who abandons the effort to commit the crime or otherwise prevents the completion of the crime shall not be liable for punishment under this Statute for the attempt to commit that crime if that person completely and voluntarily gave up the criminal purpose.

4. No provision in this Statute relating to individual criminal responsibility shall affect the responsibility of States under international law.

1998 Preparatory Committee

Article 23

Individual criminal responsibility

1. The Court shall have jurisdiction over natural persons pursuant to the present Statute.
2. A person who commits a crime under this Statute is individually responsible and liable for punishment.

[3. Criminal responsibility is individual and cannot go beyond the person and the person's possessions.][169]

4. The fact that the present Statute provides criminal responsibility for individuals does not affect the responsibility of States under international law.

---

[169] This proposal deals mainly with the limits of civil liability and should be further discussed in connection with penalties, forfeiture and compensation to victims of crimes.

[5. The Court shall also have jurisdiction over legal persons, with the exception of States, when the crimes committed were committed on behalf of such legal persons or by their agencies or representatives.

6. The criminal responsibility of legal persons shall not exclude the criminal responsibility of natural persons who are perpetrators or accomplices in the same crimes.][172]

NB: In the context of paragraphs 5 and 6, see also articles 76 (Penalties applicable to legal persons) and 99 (Enforcement of fines and forfeiture measures).

7. [Subject to the provisions of articles 25, 28 and 29,] a person is criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime defined [in article 5] [in this Statute] if that person:

(a) commits such a crime, whether as an individual, jointly with another, or through another person regardless of whether that person is criminally responsible;

(b) orders, solicits or induces the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted;

[(c) fails to prevent or repress the commission of such a crime in the circumstances set out in article 25;]

(d) [with [intent] [knowledge] to facilitate the commission of such a crime,] aids, abets or otherwise assists in the commission [or attempted commission] of that crime, including providing the means for its commission;[173]

(e) either:

(i) [Intentionally] [participates in planning] [plans] to commit such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted; or

[(ii) Agrees with another person or persons that such a crime be committed and an overt act in furtherance of the agreement is committed by any of

[172] There is a deep divergence of views as to the advisability of including criminal responsibility of legal persons in the Statute. Many delegations are strongly opposed, whereas some strongly favour its inclusion. Others have an open mind. Some delegations hold the view that providing for only the civil or administrative responsibility/liability of legal persons could provide a middle ground. This avenue, however, has not been thoroughly discussed. Some delegations, who favour the inclusion of legal persons, hold the view that this expression should be extended to organizations lacking legal status.

[173] It was pointed out that the commentary to the ILC Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind (Official Records of the General Assembly Fifty-first Session, Supplement No. 10 and corrigendum (A/51/10 and Corr.1, p. 24, para. (12))) implicitly also includes aiding, abetting or assisting ex post facto. This presumption was questioned in the context of the International Criminal Court if aiding, etc., ex post facto were deemed necessary to be criminalized, an explicit provision would be needed.

these persons that manifests their intent [and such a crime in fact occurs or is attempted];][172] [173]

(f) [directly and publicly] incites the commission of [such a crime] [genocide] [which in fact occurs], [with the intent that such crime be committed];

(g)[174] [with the intent to commit such a crime,] attempts to commit that crime by taking action that commences its execution by means of a substantial step, but that crime does not occur because of circumstances independent of the person's intentions.[175]

*NB: This article should be re-examined as to the references to the mental element in view of article 29 (*Mens rea (mental elements)).

[Article 28

Actus reus (act and/or omission)

1. Conduct for which a person may be criminally responsible and liable for punishment as a crime can constitute either an act or an omission, or a combination thereof.

2. Unless otherwise provided and for the purposes of paragraph 1, a person may be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for an omission where the person [could] [has the ability], [without unreasonable risk of danger to him/herself or others,] but intentionally [with the intention to facilitate a crime] or knowingly fails to avoid the result of an offence where:

(a) the omission is specified in the definition of the crime under this Statute; or

(b) in the circumstances, [the result of the omission corresponds to the result of a crime committed by means of an act] [the degree of unlawfulness realized by such omission corresponds to the degree of unlawfulness to be realized by the commission of such act], and the person is [either] under a pre-existing [legal] obligation under this Statute to avoid the result of such crime [or creates a particular risk or danger that subsequently leads to the commission of such crime].

[3. A person is only criminally responsible under this Statute for committing a crime if the harm required for the commission of the crime is caused by and [accountable] [attributable] to his or her act or omission.]]

[172] In addition to the two types of conduct described in paragraph (e), there is a third type of criminal association that may be considered. One formulation of this third category would be to refer to the conduct of a person who "participates in an organization which aints at the realization of such a crime by engaging in an activity that furthers or promotes that realization".

[173] The inclusion of this subparagraph gave rise to divergent views.

[174] Questions pertaining to voluntary abandonment or repentance should be further discussed in connection with grounds for excluding criminal responsibility.

[175] A view was expressed that it would be preferable that issues connected with attempt betaken up in a separate article rather than in the framework of individual responsibility. In that view, the article on individual responsibility should only refer to the way in which the person takes part in the commission of a crime, regardless of whether it deals with a completed crime or an attempted crime.

ZUTPHEN DRAFT

Article 17[B a.to d.][176]

Individual criminal responsibility

1. The Court shall have jurisdiction over natural persons pursuant to the present Statute.

2. A person who commits a crime under this Statute is individually responsible and liable for punishment.

[3. Criminal responsibility is individual and cannot go beyond the person and the person's possessions.][177]

4. The fact that the present Statute provides criminal responsibility for individuals does not affect the responsibility of States under international law.

[5. The Court shall also have jurisdiction over legal persons, with the exception of States, when the crimes committed were committed on behalf of such legal persons or by their agencies or representatives.

6. The criminal responsibility of legal persons shall not exclude the criminal responsibility of natural persons who are perpetrators or accomplices in the same crimes.][178]

N.B.: In the context of paragraphs 5 and 6, see also articles 69[47 bis] (Penalties applicable to legal persons) and 88[59 ter] (Enforcement of fines and forfeiture measures)

7. [Subject to the provisions of articles 19[C], 22[G] and 23[H],] a person is criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime defined [in article 5[20]] [in this Statute] if that person:

(a) commits such a crime, whether as an individual, jointly with another, or through another person regardless of whether that person is criminally responsible;

(b) orders, solicits or induces the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted;

[(c) fails to prevent or repress the commission of such a crime in the circumstances set out in article 19[C];]

---

[176] A/AC.249/1997/L.5, pp. 20-22.

[177] This proposal deals mainly with the limits of civil liability and should be further discussed in connection with penalties, forfeiture and compensation to victims of crimes.

[178] There is a deep divergence of views as to the advisability of including criminal responsibility of legal persons in the Statute. Many delegations are strongly opposed, whereas some strongly favour its inclusion. Others have an open mind. Some delegations hold the view that providing for only the civil or administrative responsibility/liability of legal persons could provide a middle ground. This avenue, however, has not been thoroughly discussed. Some delegations, who favour the inclusion of legal persons, hold the view that this expression should be extended to organizations lacking legal status.

(d) [with [intent] [knowledge] to facilitate the commission of such a crime,] aids, abets or otherwise assists in the commission [or attempted commission] of that crime, including providing the means for its commission;[179]

(e) either:

(i) [intentionally] [participates in planning] [plans] to commit such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted; or

[(ii) agrees with another person or persons that such a crime be committed and an overt act in furtherance of the agreement is committed by any of these persons that manifests their intent [and such a crime in fact occurs or is attempted];[180]][181]

(f) [directly and publicly] incites the commission of [such a crime] [genocide] [which in fact occurs], [with the intent that such crime be committed];

(g)[182] [with the intent to commit such a crime,] attempts to commit that crime by taking action that commences its execution by means of a substantial step, but that crime does not occur because of circumstances independent of the person's intentions.[183]

N.B.: This article should be reexamined as to the references to the mental element in view of article 23[H] (Mens rea (mental elements)).

DECISIONS TAKEN BY THE PREPARATORY COMMITTEE AT ITS SESSION HELD 11 TO 21 FEBRUARY 1997

Article B a.

Individual criminal responsibility

a. Personal jurisdiction

1. The Court shall have jurisdiction over natural persons pursuant to the present Statute.

---

[179] It was pointed out that the commentary to the ILC Draft Code of Crimes (A/51/10, p. 24, para. (12)) implicitly also includes aiding, abetting or assisting ex post facto. This presumption was questioned in the context of the ICC. If aiding, etc., ex post facto were deemed necessary to be criminalized, an explicit provision would be needed.

[180] In addition to the two types of conduct described in para. (e), there is a third type of criminal association that may be considered. One formulation of this third category would be to refer to the conduct of a person who "participates in an organization which aims at the realization of such a crime by engaging in an activity that furthers or promotes that realization".

[181] The inclusion of this subparagraph gave rise to divergent views.

[182] Questions pertaining to voluntary abandonment or repentance should be further discussed in connection with grounds for excluding criminal responsibility.

[183] Questions pertaining to voluntary abandonment or repentance should be further discussed in connection with grounds for excluding criminal responsibility.

2. A person who commits a crime under this Statute is individually responsible and liable for punishment.

[3. Criminal responsibility is individual and cannot go beyond the person and the person's possessions.]

4. The fact that the present Statute provides criminal responsibility for individuals does not affect the responsibility of States under international law.

[5. The Court shall also have jurisdiction over juridical persons, with the exception of States, when the crimes committed were committed on behalf of such juridical persons or by their agencies or representatives.

6. The criminal responsibility of juridical persons shall not exclude the criminal responsibility of natural persons who are perpetrators or accomplices in the same crimes.]

Article B b., c. and d.

Individual criminal responsibility

[Subject to the provisions of articles C, G and H,] a person is criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime defined [in article 20] [in this Statute] if that person:

[(a) commits such a crime, whether as an individual, jointly with another, or through another person regardless of whether that person is criminally responsible;

(b) orders, solicits or induces the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted;

[(c) fails to prevent or repress the commission of such a crime in the circumstances set out in article __ [referring to command/superior responsibility];]

(d) [with [intent] [knowledge] to facilitate the commission of such a crime,] aids, abets or otherwise assists in the commission [or attempted commission] of that crime, including providing the means for its commission;

[(e) either:

(i) [intentionally] [participates in planning] [plans] to commit such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted; or

[(ii) agrees with another person or persons that such a crime be committed and an overt act in furtherance of the agreement is committed by any of these persons that manifests their intent [and such a crime in fact occurs or is attempted];]

(f) [directly and publicly] incites the commission of [such a crime] [genocide] [which in fact occurs], [with the intent that such crime be committed];

(g) [with the intent to commit such a crime,] attempts to commit that crime by taking action that commences its execution by means of a substantial step, but that crime does not occur because of circumstances independent of the person's intentions.

Article G

Actus reus (act and/or omission)

1. Conduct for which a person may be criminally responsible and liable for punishment as a crime can constitute either an act or an omission, or a combination thereof.

2. Unless otherwise provided and for the purposes of paragraph 1, a person may be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for an omission where the person [could] [has the ability], [without unreasonable risk of danger to him/herself or others,] but intentionally [with the intention to facilitate a crime] or knowingly fails to avoid the result of an offence where:

(a) The omission is specified in the definition of the crime under this Statute; or

(b) In the circumstances, [the result of the omission corresponds to the result of a crime committed by means of an act] [the degree of unlawfulness realized by such omission corresponds to the degree of unlawfulness to be realized by the commission of such act], and the person is [either] under a pre-existing [legal] obligation under this Statute[184] to avoid the result of such crime [or creates a particular risk or danger that subsequently leads to the commission of such crime].[185]

[3. A person is only criminally responsible under this Statute for committing a crime if the harm required for the commission of the crime is caused by and [accountable] [attributable] to his or her act or omission.][186][187]

1996 Preparatory Committee

Article B

Individual criminal responsibility

a. Personal jurisdiction

Proposal 1

1. The International Tribunal shall have jurisdiction over [natural] persons pursuant to the provisions of the present statute.

2. A person who commits a crime under this statute is individually responsible and liable for punishment.

[2 bis. Criminal responsibility is individual and cannot go beyond the person and his/her possessions.]

---

[184] Some delegations questioned whether the source of this obligation is wider than the Statute.

[185] Some delegations had concerns about including this clause which referred to the creation of a risk. Other delegations thought that, in the context of the offences of the Statute, breach of an obligation under the Statute to avoid the result of a crime was sufficient.

[186] Some delegations thought that a provision on causation was not necessary.

[187] These brackets reflect the view expressed that, although much progress has been made on thedefinition of omission, the question of whether omission should be inserted in the Statute depends upon the final drafting of this article.

3. The fact that the present Statute provides criminal responsibility for individuals does not [prejudice] [affect] the responsibility of States under international law.

Proposal 2

Physical persons and juridical persons

1. The Court shall be competent to take cognizance of the criminal responsibility of:

(a) Physical persons;

(b) Juridical persons, with the exception of States, when the crimes committed were committed on behalf of such juridical persons or by their agencies or representatives.

2. The criminal responsibility of juridical persons shall not exclude the criminal responsibility of physical persons who are perpetrators of or accomplices in the same crimes.

3. These provisions shall be without prejudice to the responsibility of States with respect to international law.

Note

Some delegations indicated that the expression "juridical persons" should extend to organizations lacking a legal status.

Some delegations expressed doubts about including the criminal responsibility of juridical persons into the Statute.

It was proposed as an alternative the possibility of referring to the "responsibility" of the juridical persons without including the word "criminal".

b. Principle of criminal responsibility Criminal responsibility of principals

1. A person is criminally responsible as a principal and is liable for punishment for a crime under this Statute if the person, with the mental element required for the crime:

(a) Commits the conduct specified in the description (definition) of the crime;

(b) Causes the consequences, if any, specified in that description (definition); and

(c) Does so in the circumstances, if any, specified in that description (definition).

2. Where two or more persons jointly commit a crime under this Statute with a common intent to commit such crime, each person shall be criminally responsible and liable to be punished as a principal.

[3. A person shall be deemed to be a principal where that person commits the crime through an innocent agent who is not aware of the criminal nature of the act committed, such as a minor, a person of defective mental capacity or a person acting under mistake of fact or otherwise acting without mens rea.]

[Note. This article establishes the general principle regarding the liability of principal perpetrators of a crime. Further elaboration of the elements of this general principle, such as "mental element", "conduct" and causation, are elaborated in articles G and H

Other persons who participate in the commission of a crime under this Statute would be criminally responsible and liable for punishment in the manner provided in articles B (c), I and J [and C] of this draft general part.

A question was raised whether this article is required, and whether it would be sufficient merely to state that a person who commits a crime under the Statute is criminally responsible and liable for punishment? On the other hand, it was noted that specificity of the essential elements of the principle of criminal responsibility was important; it serves as a foundation for many of the other subsequent principles and avoids the need to elaborate defences within the Statute that merely constitute negations of the existence of essential mental or physical elements.

It was noted that the choice of using the word "description" or "definition" was dependent upon answering the question whether the definition of crimes would be solely within the Statute (in which case the term "definition" would be appropriate) or whether further elaboration of the elements of the definition of a crime in the Statute might be contained in an annex (in which case the term "description" might be appropriate given that this term could encompass both the statutory definition and the annexed elaboration of elements)].

c. Participation/Complicity

Proposal 1

Responsibility of other persons in the completed crimes of principals

[1. A person who [plans,] aids, abets or solicits the commission of a crime under this Statute is criminally responsible and liable for punishment in accordance with that person's own individual responsibility apart from the responsibility of other participants.]

[2. A person who plans the commission of a crime under this Statute, which is committed by that person or another person, is criminally responsible and liable for punishment [shall be liable to the same punishment as provided in this Statute for a person who commits such crime as a principal].]

[3. A person may only be criminally responsible for planning the commission of a crime where so provided in this Statute.]

[4. A person solicits the commission of a crime if, with the purpose of encouraging another person [making another person decide] to commit [or participate in the commission of] a specific crime, the person commands, [orders], requests, counsels or incites the other person to engage [or participate] in the commission of such crime, and the other person commits a crime [or is otherwise criminally responsible for such crime] as a result of such solicitation.

5. A person who solicits the commission of a crime is criminally responsible and liable for punishment [shall be liable to the same punishment as provided in this Statute for a person who commits such crime as a principal].

6. A person aids or abets the commission of a crime if the person does anything for the purpose of facilitating the commission of such crime by another person.

7. A person who aids or abets the commission of a crime is criminally responsible and liable for punishment {shall be liable to [a reduced punishment] [to the same punishment as provided in this Statute for a person who commits such crime as a principal]}.

[Note. The importance of being able to punish the planners was recognized. Under this article, planners are punishable only if a principal actually committed a crime as a result of such planning or soliciting. An alternative way of addressing the situation of planners is through the concept of "conspiracy"; see article J and notes relating to "conspiracy", below.

It was questioned whether paragraph 1 was redundant and should be deleted in light of the specific paragraphs that followed, which describe in greater detail the forms of participation, responsibility and liability for punishment.

A question was raised whether a person who solicits another person to commit a crime should be responsible and liable not only if the other person commits the crime that was solicited but also for any other crime that the other person committed which the solicitor foresaw (or reasonably could foresee) would be committed as a result of the solicitation.

A question raised by the draft proposals is whether a person should be liable as a solicitor only if the person solicits another to be a principal perpetrator or whether the person should also be liable for soliciting another person to participate in its commission as an aider and abettor (i.e. "otherwise criminally responsible").

It was questioned whether the Statute (in a new and separate article?) should also criminalize and punish a person in the situation where that person solicits another person to commit or criminally participate in a crime, but the other person does not commit the crime.

It was also questioned whether the Statute (in a new and separate article?) should also criminalize and punish persons who aid and abet another person after the commission of a crime; (e.g. aiding a person to escape detection or arrest, or destroying or concealing evidence).

It was suggested that provisions concerning the quantum of sentence should not be included in the General Part, but be located elsewhere in the Statute.]

Proposal 2

Criminal solicitation

1. A person is guilty of criminal solicitation, if, with the purpose of making another person decide to commit an offence, he/she commands, encourages or requests another person to engage in specific criminal conduct, when such person did criminal conduct according to such solicitation.

2. The punishment of criminal solicitation shall be the same as that of principals which is provided for in this Statute.

Accessories

1. A person is guilty of accessories if he/she did a conduct that facilitates the commission of an offence.

2. The punishment of accessories shall be reduced.

Proposal 3

Perpetrator and accomplice

1. An accomplice in a crime shall be punished as the perpetrator.

2. An accomplice is a person who knowingly, through aid or assistance, facilitates the preparation or commission of a crime.

3. An accomplice is also a person who knowingly, by whatever means, plans, incites the commission, orders or assists and encourages the planning, preparation or commission of a crime.

d. Combined proposal covering both: (b) principle of criminal responsibility and (c) participation/complicity

1. The following shall be considered perpetrators or participants of the crimes defined in the present Statute:

(a) Those who agree or prepare its perpetration;
(b) Those who commit such crimes;
(c) Those who jointly commit such crimes;
(d) Those who commit such crimes by means of a third person;
(e) Those who order intentionally a third person to perpetrate such crimes;
(f) Those who assist intentionally others in the perpetration of such crimes;
(g) Those who intervene without prior agreement with other persons in the perpetration of such crimes, when it is not possible to determine the result that each one produced.

2. The persons mentioned above will be liable in proportion to their responsibility.

ARTICLE 26
EXCLUSION OF JURISDICTION OVER PERSONS UNDER EIGHTEEN

ROME STATUTE

Article 26

Exclusion of jurisdiction over persons under eighteen

The Court shall have no jurisdiction over any person who was under the age of 18 at the time of the alleged commission of a crime.

5821

OXFORD

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW

Antonio Cassese

2995

S822

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Great Clarendon Street, Oxford OX2 6DP

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship,
and education by publishing worldwide in

Oxford New York

Auckland Bangkok Buenos Aires Cape Town Chennai
Dar es Salaam Delhi Hong Kong Istanbul Karachi Kolkata
Kuala Lumpur Madrid Melbourne Mexico City Mumbai Nairobi
São Paulo Shanghai Taipei Tokyo Toronto

Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press
in the UK and in certain other countries

Published in the United States
by Oxford University Press Inc., New York

© Antonio Cassese, 2003

The moral rights of the author have been asserted
Database right Oxford University Press (maker)

First published 2003

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means,
without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press,
or as expressly permitted by law, or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organizations. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department,
Oxford University Press, at the address above

You must not circulate this book in any other binding or cover and you must impose this same condition on any acquirer

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Data available

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Data applied for

ISBN-13: 978-0-19-925911-3
ISBN-10: 0-19-925911-9

7 9 10 8 6

Typeset in Adobe Minion
by RefineCatch Limited, Bungay, Suffolk
Printed in Great Britain by Ashford Colour Press Ltd, Gosport, Hampshire

2996

S623

9

PERPETRATION AND OTHER MODALITIES OF CRIMINAL CONDUCT

9.1 GENERAL

As in any national legal system, also in international criminal law responsibility arises not only when a person materially commits a crime but also when he or she engages in other forms or modalities of criminal conduct. In the following paragraphs I shall set out these different modalities of participation.

Before I do so, it may however prove fitting briefly to discuss the position in national legal systems. They converge in holding that, where a crime involves more than one person, all performing the same act, all are equally liable as co-perpetrators, or principals. In contrast, national legal orders differ when it comes to the punishment of two or more persons participating in a crime, where these persons do not perform the same act but in one way or another contribute to the realization of a criminal design. Many systems (for instance those of the United States, France, Austria, Italy, Uruguay, Australia) do not provide for different categories of participants, and consequently do not attach different penalties to each of the classes (principals or accessories) under which a person may eventually fall. They provide that each participant, whatever his degree of participation, must be considered as a principal; consequently the same penalty may be meted out to each of them. As the California Penal Code provides at §31, all those 'concerned in the commission of a crime' including those who aid and abet the crime, are to be held liable as principals. Nonetheless, a distinction is often drawn between three categories of participation: perpetration, on the one side, and two categories of accomplice liability, on the other, namely instigation (complicité par instigation) and aiding and abetting (complicité par aide et assistance). This distinction is based on the difference in actus reus and mens rea for each class (see below). In spite of the difference in such objective and subjective elements, the law does not however attach to each of these categories different consequences as far as penalties are concerned; or, at least, under the general sentencing tariff no distinction is made. It is only provided that for accomplices or accessories extenuating circumstances may be taken into account if their participation in the offence is less serious than that of the principal or principals. In fact, for the purposes of sentencing, judges often draw a distinction between principals, instigators, and aiders and abettors.

2997

5824

In other national legal systems (for instance, Germany and Russia) the law draws instead a normative distinction between two categories, principals, and accomplices or accessories, and provides in terms that the persons falling under the latter category must be punished less severely. Thus, for instance, in German law, the scale of penalties for accomplices (at least in the case of aiders and abettors, Gehilfe) is less harsh than for the perpetrator (Täter).[1]

We will see that in international law neither treaties nor case law (as indicative of customary rules) make any legal distinction between the various categories, at least as far as the consequent penalties are concerned. This lack of distinction follows both from: (i) the absence of any agreed scale of penalties in international criminal law and from (ii) the general character of this body of law, that is, its still rudimentary nature and the ensuing lack of formalism (see supra, 2.2).

Consequently, the differentiation between the various classes of participation in crimes, which I shall set out below, is merely based on the intrinsic features of each modality of participation. It serves a descriptive and classificatory purpose only. It is devoid of any relevance as far as sentencing is concerned. It is for judges to decide in each case on the degree of culpability of a participant in an international crime and assign the penalty accordingly, whatever the modality of participation of the offender in the crime.

9.2 PERPETRATION

Whoever physically commits a crime, either alone or jointly with other persons, is criminally liable. For instance, the soldier who kills a war prisoner or an innocent civilian is liable to punishment for a war crime. Similarly, the serviceman who rapes an enemy civilian as part of a widespread or systematic sexual attack on civilians is accountable for a crime against humanity.

Perpetration is thus the physical carrying out of the prohibited conduct, accompanied by the requisite psychological element.[2]

[1] In two cases, the Extraordinary Court Martial established in the Ottoman Empire to try persons accused of participating in massacring Armenians in 1915 and plundering their possessions, applied the 'Imperial Penal Code for Officers', which drew a normative distinction between principals and accessories. The Court therefore made a point of distinguishing between the 'principal perpetrators' and the 'accessories', and assigning a different sentence to each category of defendant. In Kemâl and Tevfik it sentenced the principal perpetrator to death and the accessory to 15 years of hard labour (at 5–6); in Bahâeldin Şâkir the majority of judges held that two defendants were accessories, while three dissenting judges held that they 'were equally guilty of having been principal co-perpetrators' (at 4 and 8).

[2] In some cases courts have minimized the role of perpetrators executing illegal orders. This for instance holds true for Alfons Gätzfrid, which concerns mistreatment at the Majdanek camp. The Stuttgart Court (Landgericht) held in a decision of 20 May 1999 that 'According to established case-law (cf. Federal Supreme Court, Part 18, 87 et seq.), the offender or accomplice is defined as one whose thoughts and actions coincide

2998

8825

9.3 CO-PERPETRATION

Crimes are often committed by a plurality of persons. If all of them materially take part in the actual perpetration of the same crime and perform the same act (for instance, they are all members of an execution squad shooting innocent civilians), we can speak of co-perpetration. All participants in the crime partake of the same criminal conduct and the attendant mens rea.

9.4 PARTICIPATION IN A COMMON PURPOSE OR DESIGN

9.4.1 PARTICIPATION ENTAILING RESPONSIBILITY FOR ALL THE ACTS FLOWING FROM THE CRIMINAL PLAN

When the crime results from the action of a multitude of persons, it may happen that not all participants perform the same act. In the case of torture one person may order the crime, another may physically execute it, yet another may watch to check whether the victim discloses any significant information, a medical doctor may be in attendance to verify whether the measures for inflicting pain or suffering are likely to cause death so as to stop the torture just before the measures become lethal, another person may carry medicine, or food for the executioners, and so on. The question arises of whether all these participants are equally responsible for the same crime, torture. Similarly, in the case of deportation of civilians or prisoners of war to an extermination camp, a commander may issue the order, several officers may organize the transport, others may take care of food and drinking water, others may carry out surveillance over the inmates so as to prevent their escape, others may search the detainees for valuables or other things before deportation, and so on.

As in most national legal systems, also in international criminal law all participants in a common criminal action are equally responsible if they (i) participate in the action, whatever their position and the extent of their contribution, and in addition (ii) with those of the author of the crime, who willingly gives in to incitement to political murder, silences his conscience and makes another person's criminal aims the basis of his own conviction and his own action or who sees to it that orders of that kind are ruthlessly carried out, or who in so doing otherwise displays consenting enthusiasm or who exploits State terror for his own purposes. Accordingly, the accused could only be shown to have an attitude denoting guilt if, over and above the activity he was instructed to carry out, he had performed some contributory act on his own initiative beyond the call of duty, shown particular enthusiasm, had acted with particular ruthlessness in the extermination operation or had shown a personal interest in the killings. These conditions cannot be shown to exist in the case of the accused. He was at the end of the chain of command, had no power of decision himself and no authority to act . . . Similarly, there is no evidence that the accused had any personal interest in the killings. He merely wanted to carry out the order which had been issued to him.'

29999

S626

intend to engage in the common criminal action. Therefore they are all to be treated as principals,[3] although of course the varying degree of culpability may be taken into account at the sentencing stage.[4]

It is important to add that the common plan or purpose need not be formally set out. As the ICTY Appeals Chamber rightly noted in Tadić (Appeal), there is no necessity for this plan, design or purpose to have been previously arranged or formulated. The common plan or purpose may materialize extemporaneously and be inferred from the fact that a plurality of persons acts in unison to put into effect a joint criminal enterprise. (§227.)

As in national legal systems, the rationale behind this legal regulation is clear: if all those who take part in a common criminal action are aware of the purpose and character of the criminal action and share the requisite criminal intent, they must perforce share criminal liability, whatever the role and position they may have played in the commission of the crime. This is the case because: (i) each of them is indispens-

[3] However, some courts of common law countries have taken the view that participants in a common criminal design may play the role of, and be regarded as, accessories. Thus, for instance, in Einsatzgruppen, with regard to common design, the Prosecutor T. Taylor, in his closing statement noted that 'the elementary principle must be borne in mind that neither under Control Council Law No. 10 nor under any known system of criminal law is guilt for murder confined to the man who pulls the trigger or buries the corpse. In line with recognized principles common to all civilized legal systems, paragraph 2 of Article II of Control Council Law No. 10 specifies a number of types of connection with crime which are sufficient to establish guilt. Thus, not only are principals guilty but also accessories, those who take a consenting part in the commission of crime or are connected with plans or enterprises involved in its commission, those who order or abet crime, and those who belong to an organization or group engaged in the commission of crime. These provisions embody no harsh or novel principles of criminal responsibility' (at 372).

[4] In this connection one may mention, by way of example, a decision of the Supreme Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina in Tepež, delivered on 1 October 1999: 'The appeal by the defence counsel argues that the contested judgment has not individualised the criminal responsibility of the accused and his personal involvement in actions characteristic of a war crime against the civilian population. For this crime to exist it is necessary to "commit murder, torture, inhumane acts, inflict severe suffering, physical and mental injuries on civilians, destroying their health and physical integrity". The disposition does not include these essential elements of this criminal act and therefore represents a major violation of the provisions of criminal procedure. This Court finds these allegations groundless.

'The appeal fails to note that the contested judgment states that the accused carried out these actions with three other named individuals (as well as others), which means that he perpetrated the crime for which he has been pronounced guilty in complicity with others. It further means that in cases of this kind where it is not possible to isolate individual actions and their consequences or to distinguish the degree to which each person was involved in their execution, it suffices that these actions complement each other and together form a single entity, which the accused [Tepe] wishes to achieve by being involved. Therefore it was neither possible nor necessary for the court of first instance to separate only the actions of the accused. It suffices that the accused participated in executing these actions, even if it had only been one or two actions of personal involvement in the beating of civilians. However, the court of first instance has established that the accused personally beat up many individuals on many occasions' (at 2).

One may also mention the decision of a Canadian court in Moreno: 'In reaching this conclusion, I am influenced by one commentator's view that the closer a person is involved in the decision-making process and the less he or she does to thwart the commission of inhumane acts, the more likely criminal responsibility will attach . . . of course, the further one is distanced from the decision makers, assuming that one is not a "principal", then it is less likely that the required degree of complicity necessary to attract criminal sanctions, or the application of the exclusion clause, will be met' (at 18). See also Ramirez (at 6–9).

3000

5627

able for the achievement of the final result, and on the other hand (ii) it would be difficult to distinguish between the degree of criminal liability, except for sentencing purposes.

One may find a particularly clear and significant illustration of this category of criminality in Alfons Klein and others (the Hadamar trial), heard by a US Military Commission sitting at Wiesbaden. It may prove fitting to dwell on this case at some length, because it best shows how the category of criminality at hand works.

The accused were seven Germans. Between July 1944 and April 1945, they killed over 400 Polish and Russian nationals, who had been obliged to work in Germany for the German war effort and were suffering from tuberculosis or pneumonia. Brought to Hadamar, in Germany, where there was a hospital or institution originally designed to care for the mentally unsound, but with no medical facilities to treat persons sick with tuberculosis or pneumonia, they were told that they would be given medication. In fact they were killed by injections of poisonous drugs; afterwards the relevant medical records and death certificates were falsified. It would seem that the primary purpose of these killings was to make space in hospitals for German war victims. The accused comprised Klein, the administrative head of the hospital, a local Nazi Party leader who made all the arrangements leading to the perpetration of the atrocities; Wahlmann, a physician specializing in mental diseases, the Institution's only doctor (he participated in the conferences designed to plan the murders, knew what was going on at the hospital, and acquiesced in it); three nurses, Ruoff, Willig, and Huber, who administered the poisonous drugs; Merkle, the institution's book-keeper (who registered incoming patients for the purpose of recording dates and causes of death, actually falsifying these documents); and Blum, a doorman and telephone switchboard operator, who also served as caretaker of the cemetery, charged with burying the victims in mass graves (but he sometimes walked through the wards to inspect the victims before they were taken, dead, to his cellars a few hours later).

The charge for all of them was of 'violation of international law', namely, as the Prosecutor specified in his opening argument, breach of the laws of warfare (at 202). The specification stated that the seven accused 'acting jointly and in pursuance of a common intent' 'did . . . wilfully, deliberately and wrongfully aid, abet and participate in the killing of human beings of Polish and Russian nationality'. Thus, in addition to the notion of 'participation in killing based on common intent' also the notion of 'aiding and abetting' was used. However, in his Opening Argument the Prosecutor, when setting out the applicable law (there was no Judge Advocate), emphasized that all those who participate in a common criminal enterprise are equally guilty as 'co-principals' whatever the role played by each single participant. Referring to the case of murder committed by several persons, he pointed out that:

> Every single one of those who participated in any degree towards the accomplishment of that result [murder] is as much guilty of murder as the man who actually pulled the trigger . . . That is why under our [that is, US] Federal Law all distinctions between accomplices, between accessories before the fact and accessories after the fact, have been completely eliminated. Anyone who participates in the commission of any crime, whether formerly called as an accessory or not, are now co-principals and have been so for several years. (At 203.)

3001

S628

Moving then to the case at bar, the Prosecutor in fact offered an eloquent illustration of the rationale behind the legal notion he was invoking:

> At this Hadamar mill there was operated a production line of death. Not a single one of these accused could do all the things that were necessary in order to have the entire scheme of things in operation. For instance, the accused Klein, the administrative head, could not make the initial arrangements, receive those people, attend to undressing them, make arrangements for their death chamber, and at the same time go up there and use the needle that did the dirty work, and then also turn around and haul the bodies out and bury them, and falsify the records and the death certificates. No, when you do business on a wholesale production basis as they did at the Hadamar Institution, that murder factory, it means that you have to have several people doing different things of that illegal operation in order to produce the results, and you cannot draw a distinction between the man who may have initially conceived the idea of killing them and those who participated in the commission of those offences. Now, there is no question but that any person who participated in that matter, no matter to what extent, technically is guilty of the charge that has been brought . . . every single one of the accused has overtly and affirmatively participated in this entire network that brought about the illegal result. (At 205–7.)

The defence counsel did not dispute these concepts, but in their arguments preferred to rely upon the notions of necessity and superior orders, or argued that German law rather than US or international law should apply. The Court upheld the charge. The administrative head of the hospital and two nurses were sentenced to death; the physician (a 70-year-old man) to life imprisonment and hard labour; the book-keeper to 35 years and hard labour; the third nurse to 25 years and hard labour; the doorman and caretaker to 30 years and hard labour (at 247).

In international case law there are many other notable examples of this form of criminality. Some British and US courts, influenced by common law concepts, have utilized the notion of 'persons concerned' in, for instance, the killing of the victim, or the concept of 'common purpose' or 'common design'.[5] In contrast other courts, for instance Dutch, German, and Italian, holding to civil law terminology, have preferred

[5] See for instance Josef Kramer and others (the Belsen trial), at 638–40; Heinz Heck and others (the Peleus trial), at 122 as well as Burgholz (No. 2) at 82 and the Loibl Pass (No. 1) case, at 2. See also Erich Killinger and others (the Dulag Luft trial), at 224–5, 235. In the latter case the Prosecutor, in the absence of a Judge Advocate, submitted that each of the five accused 'was concerned, in his respective capacity on the staff of Dulag Luft, as a party to the ill-treatment of prisoners of war, and concerned with sufficient proximity to make him criminally responsible on the ordinary standards of criminal responsibility in English law, either by being an accessory before the fact, or a principal in the second degree, or a principal in the first degree, or an accessory after the fact'. He further submitted that the five accused 'were all there at times when that system was working, and . . . those incidents occurred in circumstances in which a reasonable man can only come to the firm judgment that each one of those five accused was criminally concerned in that ill-treatment borne out in the evidence before you' (at 235). However, the Court found that two of the accused were not guilty (at 236).

Falkenhorst also deserves to be mentioned. The Judge Advocate, addressing the third charge against the accused, General von Falkenhorst (that he, 'as Commander-in-Chief, with knowledge, with understanding and with the intention, was concerned in the killing of . . . fourteen British prisoners'), stated that '"Concerned in the killing" is a wide phrase, and we all agree it is not confined to the person who actually to rely upon the notion of 'concurrence of persons in a crime'. As the cases brought before the former courts are more numerous, it may prove useful to dwell on some of these cases.

3002

5829

does the killing; I think we all agree that it could only apply to somebody who has some power or authority to influence the result, and the case for the Prosecution on this is very straightforward, that is nothing more nor less than they allege you should find that these people, who should have been treated, according to the Prosecution, as prisoners of war, were shot, or murdered as the Prosecution put it, because of the specific order to which I have already referred emanating from the Commander-in-chief which was binding on the forces of the Wehrmacht who carried out these executions' (at 231); the Court found the accused guilty and sentenced him to 'death by being shot' (at 240–1).

Wolfgang Zeuss and others (the Natzweiler trial) is also interesting. Four women working for the Resistance movement were arrested by the Gestapo in France, sent to a detention camp in Struthof/Natzweiler, taken to the crematorium, and executed by injection. The accused included the commandant as well as the head of the political department of the concentration camp, the camp doctor, a prisoner employed in the crematorium, a camp medical orderly, a clerk in the political department, the camp dentist, and some military staff. The Judge Advocate, discussing the charge against the accused, that is, that all of them were concerned in a killing, noted that that charge did not make it necessary 'that any person should actually be present'. 'None of the accused is actually charged with killing any of the women concerned. They are charged with being concerned in a killing, and you can be concerned in a killing without being actually present at the time when the killing takes place. If two or more men set out on a murder and one perhaps stands half a mile away from where the actual murder is committed, perhaps to keep guard, although he is not actually present when the murder is done, if he is taking part with the other man with the knowledge that the other man is going to do the killing, then he is just as guilty as the person who fires the shot or delivers the blow, or however the murder is committed. Although much evidence in this case has been directed towards establishing who was actually present in the crematorium, you have got to cast your vision further afield and consider whether, in spite of anybody not having been proved to be present, they may nevertheless still be concerned in the killing' (at 200–1). The Court found three defendants not guilty and sentenced the camp doctor to death and the others to various terms of imprisonment (at 218 and 222).

It is also worth mentioning Sumida Haruzo and others (the 'Double Tenth' trial). This case is relevant in two respects: the possible criminal responsibility of interpreters, and that of members of special units.

The accused, a Japanese military unit, were charged with ill-treatment and torture of British prisoners of war in Singapore. Among the accused were some interpreters. The defence argued that they had simply acted as a medium of communication (at 245–9). 'The responsibility of an interpreter . . .—argue defence counsel—is a non-commissive responsibility. An interpreter has neither the right nor the authority to stop an act of torture' (at 249). The Prosecution submitted instead that they had in some way participated in ill-treatment by actually taking part in the beating or torture of the prisoners (at 255, 264–5). The Court sentenced the interpreters either to imprisonment or to death (at 280–1).

On the question of criminal liability of members of a military unit committing crimes, the Prosecutor noted that 'where a branch of [a] unit of the Kempei Tai [Japanese military police force; the Singapore branch was charged with preserving public peace and military policing] has been proved beyond reasonable doubt to have been participating in a war crime, then every man who is proved to have been a member of that particular unit during the relevant period may, prima facie, be held responsible for that war crime, even though no concrete criminal act has been brought home to him specifically as an individual. And I would go further than that, and suggest respectfully, that in a case such as this, where the very closest privity and connection has been proved to have existed between all members of the Singapore Kempei Tai, which was charged as a unit with the prosecution of this specific No. 1 Work, then the Court should consider very carefully whether the mere presence of a man with such a unit does not constitute prima facie evidence of his complicity, but goes much further and establishes a strong presumption of guilt. I do not go so far as to suggest a shifting of the burden of proof, which does, and always must, remain with the Prosecution . . . The degree of complicity on the part of any particular individual is, of course, a matter to which you, gentlemen, would have to direct your minds much later in apportioning any sentence which might be necessary; but in the determination of the question of guilt or innocence of a crime such as this—the result of a deliberate policy carried out by a whole unit—such a consideration is, in my submission, totally irrelevant' (at 259; see also 271–2). The Court acquitted six defendants and condemned the others to varying sentences (at 275–82).

3003

5830

In Ponzano, a case concerning the unlawful killing of four British prisoners of war by German troops, the Judge Advocate adopted the approach suggested by the Prosecutor, and stressed:

> the requirement that an accused, before he can be found guilty, must have been concerned in the offence . . . [T]o be concerned in the commission of a criminal offence . . . does not only mean that you are the person who in fact inflicted the fatal injury and directly caused death, be it by shooting or by any other violent means; it also means an indirect degree of participation . . . [I]n other words, he must be the cog in the wheel of events leading up to the result which in fact occurred. He can further that object not only by giving orders for a criminal offence to be committed, but he can further that object by a variety of other means. (At 7.)

The Judge Advocate also underlined the necessity of knowledge on the part of the accused as to the intended purpose of the criminal enterprise.[6]

Courts also applied the notion of common purpose in cases where the crimes had allegedly been committed by members of military or administrative units running concentration camps; that is, by groups of persons acting pursuant to a concerted plan. In this respect one may mention such cases as Dachau Concentration Camp, brought before a US Tribunal under Control Council Law no. 10 (at 5, 14), Nadler and others, decided by a British Court of Appeal under Control Council Law no. 10 (at 132–4), Auschwitz Concentration Camp, decided by a German Court (at 882), as well as Belsen, decided by a British military court sitting in Germany (at 121). In these cases the accused held some position of authority within the hierarchy of the concentration camps. Normally, the accused were charged with having acted in pursuance of a common design to kill or mistreat prisoners and hence to commit war crimes.[7]

The accused, when found guilty, were regarded as co-principals in the various crimes of ill-treatment, because of their objective 'position of authority' within the concentration camp system and because they had 'the power to look after the inmates

[6] Georg Otto Sandrock et al. (also known as the Almelo Trial) can also be cited. Three Germans had killed a British prisoner of war; it was clear that they all had had the intention of killing the British soldier, although each of them played a different role. The British Court found all of them guilty of murder under the doctrine of 'common enterprise' (at 35, 40–1). In Hölzer and others, brought before a Canadian military court, in his summing up the Judge Advocate emphasized that the three accused (Germans who had killed a Canadian prisoner of war) knew that the purpose of taking the Canadian to a particular area was to kill him. The Judge Advocate spoke of a 'common enterprise' with regard to that murder (at 341, 347, 349). In Jepsen and others a British court had to pronounce upon the responsibility of Jepsen and others for the death of inmates of a concentration camp in transit to another concentration camp. The Prosecutor argued that '[I]f Jepsen was joining in this voluntary slaughter of eighty or so people, helping the others by doing his share of killing, the whole eighty odd deaths can be laid at his door and at the door of any single man who was in any way assisting in that act'. The Judge Advocate did not rebut the argument (at 241). In Schonfeld the Judge Advocate stated that: 'if several persons combine for an unlawful purpose or for a lawful purpose to be effected by unlawful means, and one of them in carrying out that purpose, kills a man, it is murder in all who are present . . . provided that the death was caused by a member of the party in the course of his endeavours to effect the common object of the assembly' (at 68).

[7] In his summing up in the Belsen case, the Judge Advocate took up the three requirements set out by the Prosecution as necessary to establish guilt in each case: (i) the existence of an organized system to ill-treat the detainees and commit the various crimes alleged; (ii) the accused's awareness of the nature of the system; and (iii) the fact that the accused in some way actively participated in enforcing the system, i.e., encouraged, aided, and abetted or in any case participated in the realization of the common criminal design (at 637–41).

3004

5831

and make their life satisfactory' but failed to do so. In these cases, as the ICTY Appeals Chamber pointed out in Tadić (Appeal):

> the required actus reus was the active participation in the enforcement of a system of oppression, as it could be inferred from the position of authority and the specific functions held by each accused. The mens rea element comprised: (i) knowledge of the nature of the system and (ii) the intent to further the common concerted design to ill-treat inmates. It is important to note that, in these cases, the requisite intent could also be inferred from the position of authority held by the camp personnel. Indeed, it was scarcely necessary to prove intent where the individual's high rank or authority would have, in and of itself, indicated an awareness of the common design and an intent to participate therein. All those convicted were found guilty of the war crime of ill-treatment, although of course the penalty varied according to the degree of participation of each accused in the commission of the war crime. (§203.)

9.4.2 PARTICIPATION ENTAILING RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE FORESEEABLE CRIMES OF OTHER PARTICIPANTS

In other cases where a multitude of persons participates in the commission of a crime, it may happen that, although all participants share from the outset the common criminal design, one or more perpetrators commit a crime that had not been (expressly or implicitly) agreed upon or envisaged at the beginning, and therefore did not constitute part and parcel of the joint criminal enterprise. For instance, a group of soldiers, acting under superior orders, set out to detain, contrary to international law, a group of civilians; however, one of the servicemen, in the heat of military action, tortures or rapes one or more of those civilians. Are the other soldiers equally responsible for this additional crime, not envisaged in the joint criminal design?

The ICTY Appeals Chamber clarified this legal issue in Tadić (Appeal). There it held that 'responsibility for a crime other than the one agreed upon in the common plan arises only if, under the circumstances of the case, (i) it was foreseeable that such a crime might be perpetrated by one or other members of the group and (ii) the accused willingly took that risk' (§228). The Appeals Chamber showed that this proposition was based on case law, had a solid underpinning in many national legal systems, and in addition was consonant with the general principles on criminal responsibility laid down both in the ICTY Statute and in customary international law (§§224–9).

In the case at issue the Appeals Chamber held that Tadić, the appellant, was 'an armed member of an armed group' that attacked a village in Bosnia and Herzegovina, during the armed conflict raging in the Prijedor region; he took an active part in the attack, rounding up and severely beating some members of the non-Serb population living there. The armed group, in pursuance of its violent action against non-Serbs, killed five of them. According to the Appeals Chamber the only possible inference was that Tadić 'had the intention to further the criminal purpose to rid the Prijedor region of the non-Serb population, by committing inhumane acts against them. That

3005

8832

... Serbs might be killed in the effecting of this common aim was, in the circumstances of the . . . case, foreseeable. The Appellant [Tadić] was aware that the actions of the group of which he was a member were likely to lead to such killings, but he nevertheless willingly took that risk'. The Chamber consequently found Tadić guilty of wilful killing as a grave breach as well as a war crime and a crime against humanity (§§230–7).[8]

9.4.3 AIDING AND ABETTING

A person may participate in a crime without sharing the criminal intent of the principal perpetrator, but simply by assisting him in the commission of the crime. In aiding and abetting the objective element is constituted by practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support, by the accessory to the principal (namely the author of the main crime); in addition, such assistance, support etc. must have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime. The subjective element resides in the accessory having knowledge that 'his actions assist the perpetrator in the commission of the crime'. (This, with convincing arguments, an ICTY Trial Chamber held in Furundžija (§§190–249); see also Musema (§126), Aleksovski (§63), Kunarac and others (§391).)

Thus, unlike the instances considered previously, aiding and abetting does not necessarily presuppose that the aider and abettor shares a common plan or purpose with the principal or his criminal intent or other form of mens rea; as stated by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Tadić, 'the principal may not even know about the accomplice's contribution' (§229). What is required is that the person supporting or assisting in the crime be aware that his action furthers and helps the perpetrator or perpetrators in the commission of the crime.

Among the various cases where the notion was applied[9] Akayesu can be cited, not so much for outlining the legal contours of the notion (the Trial Chamber at one point stated that 'complicity' was to be defined in the light of the Rwandan Penal Code: §537), as for the legal findings on this matter. The Trial Chamber found that:

[8] The ICTY Appeals Chamber confirmed the decision in Tadić (Appeal) in Aleksovski (Appeal) (§§163–4). Also a Trial Chamber referred approvingly to that decision in Kordić and Čerkez (§§393–400).

[9] Such cases include Schonfeld and Rohde, both heard by British military courts (at 64 and 56 respectively), Zyklon B, also heard by a British court (at 93), Einsatzgruppen, brought before by a US Military Tribunal sitting at Nuremberg (at 569–85), S. and others (Hechingen Deportation case), brought before a German court in the French Occupied Zone (at 484–90). However, in most of these cases the notion of aiding and abetting was not clearly defined as distinct from that of 'participation in a common purpose'. Trial Chambers of the ICTR and the ICTY have made a better jurisprudential contribution to the outlining and enunciation of the concept in Akayesu (dealing with the notion of 'complicity in genocide': §§525–48), in Tadić (§§688–92), and in Furundžija (§§190–249).

One may also mention a Canadian case involving torture: in Moreno (decision of 14 September 1993) the Court held that 'Presence at the commission of an offence can be evidence of aiding and abetting if accompanied by other factors, such as prior knowledge of the principal offender's intention to commit the offence or attendance for the purpose of encouragement . . . While mere presence at the scene of a crime (torture) is not sufficient to invoke the exclusion clause [of the Refugee Convention], the act of keeping watch with a view to preventing the intended victim from escaping may well attract criminal liability' (at 16–17). See also Ramirez (at 5–9).

3006

8633

Akayesu, in his capacity as bourgmestre [mayor], was responsible for maintaining law and public order in the commune of Taba and . . . had the effective authority over the communal police. Moreover, as 'leader' of Taba commune, of which he was one of the most prominent figures, the inhabitants respected him and followed his orders. Akayesu himself admitted before the Chamber that he had the power to assemble the population and that they obeyed his instructions. It has also been proved that a very large number of Tutsi were killed in Taba between 7 April and the end of June 1994, while Akayesu was bourgmestre of the Commune. Knowing of such killings, he opposed them and attempted to prevent them only until 18 April 1994, after which date he not only stopped trying to maintain law and order in his commune, but was also present during the acts of violence and killings, and sometimes even gave orders himself for bodily or mental harm to be caused to certain Tutsi, and endorsed and even ordered the killing of several Tutsi . . . The Chamber holds that the fact that Akayesu, as a local authority, failed to oppose such killings and serious bodily or mental harm constituted a form of tacit encouragement, which was compounded by being present [during] such criminal acts. (§§704–5.)

The Chamber added that Akayesu was present during numerous incidents of rape and sexual violence against Tutsi women and, by his attitude and utterances, encouraged such acts, thus giving 'tacit encouragement' to the rapes being committed. The Court concluded that he was criminally responsible 'for having abetted in the preparation or execution of the killings of members of the Tutsi group and the infliction of serious bodily and mental harm on members of the said group' (§§706–7).

In Furundžija an ICTY Trial Chamber found that the accused, an officer of the Bosnian Croat armed forces, was present while the victim was being raped by another officer, and interrogated her. It held that in this way he had given assistance, encouragement, or moral support, having a substantial effect on the crime by the other officer, with the knowledge that these acts assisted the commission of the offence. The Trial Chamber therefore found the defendant guilty of aiding and abetting outrages upon personal dignity including rape (§§270–5).

9.5 INCITEMENT OR INSTIGATION AS A FORM OF PARTICIPATION IN INTERNATIONAL CRIMES

Incitement to commit a crime is some form of inducement, encouragement, or persuasion to perpetrate the crime. Incitement does not necessarily presuppose a hierarchical position. It simply means taking all those psychological or physical measures designed to prompt somebody else to commit a crime. It also requires the intent to have the crime perpetrated.

As held in Blaškić, 'both positive acts and omissions may constitute instigation' (§280). Furthermore, incitement is a crime only under certain conditions: (i) it must be direct and explicit; (ii) commission of the crime must follow it up. In other words, incitement is not punished per se, but only if it leads to the commission of a crime. As we shall see, international criminal law provides for an exception to this rule, in the case of genocide.

3007

S234

An ICTY Trial Chamber held in Kordić and Čerkez that:

> although a causal relationship between the instigation and the physical perpetration of the crime needs to be demonstrated (i.e., that the contribution of the accused in fact had an effect on the commission of the crime), it is not necessary to prove that the crime would not have been perpetrated without the accused's involvement. (§387.)

The requisite subjective element may be set out as follows: (i) the person intended to induce the commission of the crime by another person, or in other words 'directly intended to provoke the commission of the crime' (Kordić and Čerkez, §387), or (ii) the person was at least aware of the likelihood that commission of the crime would be a consequence of his action; (iii) the person must possess the mens rea concerning the crime he is instigating.

In Kurt Mayer, tried by a Canadian Military Court sitting at Aurich in Germany, the accused, a Commander of the 25 SS Panzer Grenadier Regiment, was among other things charged with having incited and counselled troops under his command to deny quarter to Allied troops in 1943–4 in Belgium and France. The Judge Advocate stated:

> The first charge is quite clear and I advise the Court that the particulars in that charge allege or constitute a war crime. As it is an offence to deny quarter to prisoners I think an officer may be convicted of a war crime if he incites and counsels troops under his command to deny quarter, whether or not prisoners were killed as a result thereof. It would seem to be common sense to say that not only those members of the enemy who unlawfully kill prisoners may be charged as war criminals, but also any superior military commander who incites and counsels his troops to commit such offences. (At 840.)[10]

9.6 INCHOATE CRIMES: GENERAL

Many legal systems punish not only consummated criminal offences (for instance, murder, theft, etc.), but also 'inchoate', that is preliminary or 'just begun' criminal wrongdoings. These are acts that: (i) are preparatory to prohibited offences, (ii) have not been completed, therefore have not yet caused any harm, and (iii) are punished on their own, that is, in spite of the fact that they have not led to a completed offence.

The rationale behind criminalization of such offences is clear: the legal system intends to protect society as far as possible. Therefore, in addition to punishing offences already perpetrated, it endeavours to prevent the commission of potential transgressions. It consequently intervenes with its prohibitions at an early stage, before crimes are completed, that is, at the stage of their preparation, so as to forestall the consummation of the harmful consequences of actual crimes.

However, within this general category, one ought to distinguish three subcategories:

1. Criminal conduct that is preparatory to crimes proper, and is punished per se, that is, even if it does not lead to the actual perpetration of the crime, but, when this [10] Cases where incitement to commit war crimes was punished include Falkenhorst (at 23 and 29–30).

3008

S 135

perpetration follows, it is no longer punishable per se, as it is 'absorbed' into the actual crime (although it may be taken into account as an aggravating circumstance). This subcategory includes planning and ordering.

2. Criminal conduct that is preparatory to a crime, but which by definition cannot be followed by the intended crime. This subcategory encompasses attempt, where, by definition, the subsequent offence is not consummated (because subjective or external circumstances prevent consummation).

3. Criminal conduct that is punished per se, whether or not it is followed by the consummation of a crime; where a crime does follow, this conduct, as well as the consummated crime is punished. This subcategory includes incitement to commit genocide and conspiracy to genocide.

In many national legal systems (particularly in common law countries) three categories of such crimes are envisaged: attempt, conspiracy, and incitement. In international law, while attempt is regarded as admissible as a general class of inchoate crimes, conspiracy and incitement are only prohibited as 'preliminary' (not consummated) offences when connected to the most serious crime, genocide. The very limited acceptance of conspiracy is probably due to the fact that this class of criminal offence is not accepted in most civil law countries; hence it has been considered admissible at the international level only with regard to the most heinous and dangerous crime. Indeed, genocide is a crime that by definition attacks individuals qua members of a group and with a view to destroying the group as such.

As for incitement, as we have seen above, in international criminal law it is prohibited only if it leads to the actual perpetration of the crime, that is, as a form of participation in a crime, probably because States and courts have felt that prohibiting incitement per se in connection with any international crime including war crimes and crimes against humanity would excessively broaden the range of criminal conduct, the more so because of the difficulty of clearly delineating the notion of incitement. Incitement as such has been exceptionally prohibited, subject however to some stringent conditions, in connection, again, with the most harmful and serious international crime, genocide.

As for planning and ordering, the rationale behind the tendency of international law to punish them as inchoate crimes lies primarily in this: the most serious and large-scale international crimes result from careful preparation and concerted action by many agents, or are the result of instructions and directives issued by military or political leaders. In consequence, international criminal rules aim to prevent or at least circumscribe such conduct by stigmatizing it as criminal and making it penally punishable.

3009

S836

9.7 PLANNING

Planning consists of devising, agreeing upon with others, preparing, and arranging for the commission of a crime. Think, for instance, of planning an air attack on civilians or the use of such prohibited arms as chemical or bacteriological weapons, or the indiscriminate killing of civilians as part of a widespread or systematic attack on civilians. As an ICTR Trial Chamber held in Akayesu (§480) and ICTY Trial Chambers in Blaskić (§279), and in Kordić and Čerkez (§386) planning implies that 'one or several persons contemplate designing the commission of a crime at both the preparatory and executory phases'.

As far as international crimes are concerned, given the nature and features of such crimes, it is often the higher military or civilian authorities that carry out the planning of such crimes.

Whoever takes part in the planning of an international crime is liable to punishment for the relevant crime, whatever his rank in the hierarchy and the level of his participation. (Of course, the rank and role may be germane to punishment; it is evident that the higher the status of the planner and the intensity of his participation in the planning, the harsher should be his penalty.) The subjective element required is the intent to carry out the criminal conduct.

A difficult question is whether planning an international crime is punishable per se, regardless of whether or not it leads to the actual commission of the crime planned, or instead is only punishable if planning is followed up by perpetration of the crime. Trial Chambers of the ICTR opted for the latter solution in Akayesu (§475), Rutaganda (§34), and Musema (§115). They grounded this conclusion on the works of the International Law Commission and on the interpretation of the relevant rule of the ICTR Statute (Article 6(1)) laying down the principle of individual criminal responsibility, which 'implies that the planning or the preparation of a crime actually must lead to its commission' (Musema, §115).

It may be noted that prosecuting someone for planning, where the planning is not put into effect, comes close to prosecuting conspiracy (although with conspiracy there must be an agreement of two or more persons, whereas planning may be carried out by one person alone, and if done by more persons, no agreement is required). The ICTY and ICTR Statutes allow conspiracy for genocide, but not for crimes against humanity and war crimes. (This was also the position of the IMT at Nuremberg: conspiracy to commit crimes against peace was held admissible whereas conspiracy to commit crimes against humanity and war crimes were not.)

An ICTY Trial Chamber, ruling in Kordić and Čerkez, propounded a contrary view. It held that 'an accused may be held criminally responsible for planning alone' (§386). The reason for this conclusion is that 'planning constitutes a discrete form of responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute'. The Trial Chamber set forth, however, two caveats: first, 'a person found to have committed a crime will not be found responsible for planning the same crime'; secondly, 'an accused will only be held responsible for planning, instigating or ordering a crime if he directly or indirectly intended that the crime be committed' (§386).

3010

S837

Although there is no consistent case law on this matter, it would seem that the gravity of international crimes (or at least of the most serious among them) may warrant the conclusion that planning the commission of one or more of such crimes is punishable per se even if the crime is not actually perpetrated. The rationale is that international criminal law aims not only to punish persons found guilty of crimes, but also to prevent persons from engaging in serious criminal conduct. Consequently, in case of doubt criminal rules must be interpreted as being also designed as far as possible to prevent offences. It is warranted to infer that planning an international crime is also punishable per se as a distinct form of criminal liability, subject to a set of conditions that can be derived from the general system of international criminal law:

1. Only the planning of serious or large-scale international crimes constitutes a discrete offence: for instance, the planning of massive war crimes (such as the extermination of a large number of prisoners of war, or the large-scale deportation of civilians to extermination camps), or of crimes against humanity, or genocide. Since the rules on planning do not specify the legal ingredients of this crime, it seems warranted to maintain that, for international crimes of lesser gravity (for instance, ill-treatment of one prisoner of war, the taking by members of the Occupying Power of private property belonging to civilians), those rules must be construed in such a way as to favour the accused (favor rei). Consequently the mere planning of those crimes of lesser gravity may be held not to constitute a crime per se.

2. If planning is followed up by execution of the crime, planning is no longer punishable as a crime distinct from that resulting from its execution (in this respect planning is different from, hence may not be equated to, such 'inchoate crimes' as conspiracy to commit genocide and incitement to genocide, to be discussed below). As for the requisite mens rea, it is necessary for the author to intend that the planned crime be committed, or else he must be aware of the risk that the planned crime would be perpetrated by him or by someone else (recklessness or dolus eventualis).

9.8 ORDERING

Ordering presupposes that whoever issues the order is de jure or de facto superior (within a military or civilian hierarchy) to the one who executes it. However, as a Trial Chamber of the ICTY rightly held in Kordić and Cerkez (§388), 'no formal superior-subordinate relationship is required for a finding of "ordering" so long as it is demonstrated that the accused possessed the authority to order'. This proposition, albeit not supported by any legal reason in the judgment, is warranted because international criminal law is not a formalistic body of law geared to legal technicalities but aims at proscribing and punishing crimes whatever the modalities of their commission.

3011

5838

As ICTY Trial Chambers rightly held in Blaškić (§281) and Kordić and Cerkez (§388), there is no need for the order to be given in writing or in any particular form. In addition, the existence of an order may be proved through circumstantial evidence.

It would seem that it is not necessary for the order to be executed. An officer or any other higher authority issuing a criminal order may be found guilty even if the order is not carried out by the subordinates, if the superior intended the order to be executed and knew that the order was illegal, or else the order was manifestly illegal. Thus, in General Jacob H. Smith, in 1902 a US Court Martial held that General Smith was guilty of ordering that no quarter should be given to the enemy in the Philippines, even though in fact his troops did not comply with this order (at 799–813). In many other cases courts have convicted officers for issuing criminal orders, even if they were not executed.[11]

If the internationally unlawful order is executed, the person issuing the order is criminally liable qua co-perpetrator of the crime carried out by the subordinate.

Also for this category of criminality the requisite mental element is the intent to have the crime committed,[12] at least, as long as the order is specific, that is, instructs to perform a specific crime. However, when the order is generic, recklessness or even gross negligence may be considered sufficient.[13]

9.9 ATTEMPT

Attempt as a distinct criminal offence occurs whenever a person intending to commit a crime tries to carry it out without, however, the normal outcome of his action

[11] See, for instance, High Command (at 118–23), The Hostages Trial (at 118–23), Kurt Mayer (at 98 and 108), Falkenhorst (at 18, 23, 29–30), Hans Wickmann (at 133). In Tzofan and others v. IDF Advocate and others (Yehuda Meir case), Judge D. Levin (concurring) held that 'the higher the rank of the commanding officer and the more comprehensive and more decisive his authority, the greater the responsibility incumbent upon him to examine and determine the justification and legality of the order' (at 745).

It should be noted that ordering is sometimes treated as a species of instigation, for instance ordering that no quarter be given may be regarded as the same thing as inciting troops to commit war crimes.

[12] In Jung and Schumacher, decided by a Canadian Military Court sitting at Aurich in Germany, the Judge Advocate, in discussing the position of the defendant Jung, who had ordered the other defendant to shoot and kill a Canadian war prisoner, noted the following: 'The Court may find that the accused uttered the words or some words to do harm to the prisoner, but it must be found that he uttered them with the expectation and intention that they should be acted upon by someone who heard them, including Schumacher. In this event he would have either incited, counselled or procured the acts to have been done, and so be concerned [in the crime]. Now, if you find that the accused Jung handed the prisoner over to Schumacher, knowing or expecting he would be killed, then again he would be concerned [in the killing of the Canadian POW]' (at 219–20).

[13] In one case a Canadian Court Martial held that the defendant was guilty of negligence for issuing unlawful orders (he had instructed his subordinates that prisoners 'could be abused'): see Major A.G. Seward (at 1079–81); on this case see also above, note 16 in Chapter 8.

Interestingly, the defendant was acquitted on another count, namely of having caused bodily harm to the Somali civilians beaten up, tortured, and killed by his subordinates. The Court Martial Appeal Court of Canada noted in this regard that by this acquittal the defendant 'must be taken to have been found neither to have intended nor to have been capable or reasonably foreseeing that any of his subordinates would mistreat unto death any Somalian [sic] prisoner' (at 1082).

3012

5639

coming about. One should distinguish between two different possibilities: (i) the perpetrator takes the initial steps but is then stopped by others, or (ii) on account of circumstances independent of his will, his action does not produce the effects of his intention. In other words, he performs all the necessary acts without, however, the intended result following. An example of the first category is when a soldier starts to beat a prisoner of war savagely with the intention of killing him, and is only prevented from so doing by others who drag him off his intended victim. An example of the second category is when a soldier shoots at a prisoner of war, intending to execute him, but the intended victim is not fatally wounded and subsequently manages to escape.

Although in the case of attempt the intended harm is not caused to the victim, international law nevertheless makes attempt punishable, in order to prevent breaches of international rules as far as possible. Thus, this offence is punished in various national laws on war crimes,[14] or is regarded as a distinct offence in national case law on the same crimes.[15] Recently, customary law on the matter has been codified in Article 25(3)(f) of the ICC Statute, whereby a person is criminally responsible if he 'attempts to commit [a crime under the Court's jurisdiction] by taking action that commences its execution by means of a substantial step, but the crime does not occur because of circumstances independent of the person's intentions'.

Clearly, what is required for the attempt to be punishable, is: (i) conduct consisting of a significant commencement of the criminal action (to hold to the example given above, it is not sufficient for the guard to take the prisoner out of his cell and possibly even shout at, or abuse, him; it is necessary for the guard to start beating him savagely); (ii) the clear intention to commit a crime; (iii) failure of that intention to take effect owing to external circumstances.

This last ingredient of the objective element may also occur when the victim of the attempted crime is already dead (unless, of course, the agent knew that the victim was dead). In Charles W. Keenan the accused had been ordered by his superior to 'finish off' a civilian woman at whom the superior had already shot. A US Court of Military Appeal held that in the case at issue attempted murder was to be ruled out only because the subordinate knew that she was no longer alive when he fired at her (at 114).[16] To support its ruling the Court cited an important case, unrelated to war crimes, where the same Court had extensively dealt with the notion at issue: Rodger D. Thomas, a case of attempted rape, which had offered the Court the opportunity to [14] See, for instance, the laws cited in UN Law Reports, vol. XV, at 89 (Norway, Yugoslavia, the Netherlands).

[15] See the cases reported in UN Law Reports, vol. VI, 120, as well as in UN Law Reports, vol. VII, at 73.

[16] The Court stated that 'so far as attempted murder is concerned, military law "has tended toward the advanced and modern position" that holds one accountable for conduct which would constitute a crime if the facts were as he believed them to be (see United States v. Thomas 13 USCMA 278, 286, 32 CMR 278). Here the accused expressly testified that he believed the woman was dead; and the board of review specifically refused to find that she was still alive when the accused fired at her. Moore and Eakins also testified that they believed the victim was dead before the accused fired. The board of review could, therefore, reasonably conclude that the accused knew he was firing at a corpse. This conclusion necessarily absolves him of attempted murder' (at 113).

3013

5640

discuss the requisite ingredients of the offence, with a reasoning that is along the same lines as the notion propounded above for international criminal law (at 287–92).[17]

The ICC Statute codifies international customary laws in another respect as well. Article 25(3)(f) duly takes account of the cessation of the attempter's criminal intention and leaves his initial steps unpunished:

> However, a person who abandons the effort to commit the crime or otherwise prevents the completion of the crime shall not be liable for punishment under this Statute for the attempt to commit that crime if that person completely and voluntarily gave up the criminal purpose.

Thus, to continue with the aforementioned example, if the guard, after beating the prisoner for a while, suddenly decides not to carry through his initial purpose and takes the prisoner back to his cell, he is not guilty of attempted murder (although he may well be guilty of other crimes). Similarly, if an officer gives an order to shoot and kill a group of innocent civilians and then, just before the order is carried out, changes his mind and orders that their lives be spared, he is not considered criminally liable for murder (although he may be guilty of inhuman treatment or even torture, if he intended to carry out a mock execution).

As for the mens rea required for attempt, it may be noted that in common law systems, what is required is normally the intention to carry out the offence (recklessness is not enough). This makes it difficult to prosecute, because the question always arises: if the accused wanted, for example to kill his victim, then why did he not do so? (This is why the only cases where prosecutions are successful are where: (i) the would-be perpetrator is dragged off his victim, or (ii) the would-be perpetrator leaves his victim for dead.) It would seem that also in international criminal law the subjective element required is intent.

9.10 CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT GENOCIDE

It is common knowledge that conspiracy is a form of criminality punished in common law systems but either unknown to, or accepted to a very limited extent by, civil law countries. Conspiracy is a group offence, consisting of the agreement of two or more persons to commit a crime. It is punished even if the crime is never perpetrated. In addition, if the crime is carried out, the perpetrators are held liable both for conspiracy and for the substantive crime they commit. The mens rea element of conspiracy required for each and every participant is twofold: (i) knowledge of the facts or circumstances making up the crime the group intend to commit; (ii) intent to carry out the conspiracy and thereby perpetrate the substantive offence. Plainly, the basic rationale behind the prohibition of this crime is the need to prevent offences, [17] The Court held that the elements of the offence of attempted rape were: '(1) an overt act; (2) specific intent, (3) more than mere preparation, (4) tending to effect the commission of the offense, and (5) failure to effect its commission' (at 286).

3014

S641

especially when they involve several persons and are thus more dangerous to the community.

As noted above, in international law no customary rule has evolved on conspiracy on account of the lack of support from civil law countries for this category of crime. (In civil law systems, entering into agreement to commit a crime is not punishable per se, unless it leads to the perpetration of the crime; only exceptionally, and for such categories of serious offences as those aimed at undermining State security or at setting up associations or organizations systematically bent on criminal conduct in various areas, is conspiracy as such prohibited.)

The only international rules on conspiracy can be found in the London Agreement of 1945. In Article 6 it made punishable persons 'participating in a Common Plan or Conspiracy for the accomplishment' of any crime against peace and in addition made 'leaders, organizers, instigators or accomplices participating in the formulation or execution of a Common Plan or Conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing crimes [that is, crimes against peace, war crimes, and crimes against humanity] responsible for all acts performed by any persons in execution of such plan'. This provision laid down ex post facto law. However, as it referred to conspiracy to commit a crime against peace, it punished persons who had conspired to wage the war that had just ended. In addition, to the extent that it referred to other crimes, it also made conspiracy punishable for acts already accomplished. In other words, in the end conspiracy was held to be punishable to the extent that any plan or agreement to commit an international crime had been actually carried out. (Strikingly, Control Council Law no. 10 only referred to conspiracy to commit crimes against peace: see Article 2(1)(a).) Nevertheless, generally speaking, both the IMT at Nuremberg and the Military Tribunals sitting at Nuremberg took a restrictive view of conspiracy (see in particular Göring and others (at 224–6) and Alstötter and others (at 289–90). In the former case the influence of the French Judge Donnedieu de Vabres, and his insistence on the novel nature of conspiracy in international law, were indisputably decisive.[18]

Another international provision on the matter is Article 3(b) of the 1948 Genocide Convention, which, on the grounds and motivations set out above, makes 'conspiracy to commit genocide' punishable. It would seem that, like most other substantive provisions of the Convention, it has turned into customary law. Among other things it has been taken up in the Statutes of both the ICTY and the ICTR (but, strikingly, not in Article 6 of the ICC Statute, which consequently differs in this respect from international customary law).

In Musema an ICTR Trial Chamber held that conspiracy to commit genocide 'is to be defined as an agreement between two or more persons to commit the crime of genocide' (§191); as for mens rea, it 'rests on the concerted intent to commit genocide, [18] Donnedieu de Vabres, Procès, 528–42. He among other things held the view that in the event Article 6 (in fine), of the Nuremberg Charter upheld the French notion of 'complicité' (at 541). He also emphasized that, with regard to crimes against peace, the IMT ultimately avoided holding that there was a general conspiracy (at 541–2).

3015

SB 42

that is, to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such. Thus . . . the requisite intent for the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide is ipso facto the intent required for the crime of genocide, that is the dolus specialis of genocide' (§192).

The Chamber also emphasized that the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide is punishable even if it fails to lead to its result, that is, even if genocide is not perpetrated (§194).

9.11 INCITEMENT TO GENOCIDE

International law requires that incitement to genocide be not only direct but also public. At the same time incitement is punishable even if it is not followed by the commission of genocide.

In Akayesu a Trial Chamber of the ICTR held that direct and public incitement to commit genocide:

> must be defined for the purposes of interpreting Article 2(3)(c) [of the ICTR Statute], as directly provoking the perpetrator(s) to commit genocide, whether through speeches, shouting or threats uttered in public places or at public gatherings, or through the sale or dissemination, offer for sale or display of written material or printed matter in public places or at public gatherings, or through the public display of placards or posters, or through any other means of audiovisual communication. (§559.)

As for the subjective element of the crime, it held that:

> [it] lies in the intent to directly prompt or provoke another to commit genocide. It implies a desire on the part of the perpetrator to create by his actions a particular state of mind necessary to commit such a crime in the minds of the person(s) he is so engaging. That is to say that the person who is inciting to commit genocide must have himself the specific intent to commit genocide, namely, to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such. (§560.)

In the case at issue the Trial Chamber concluded that the accused was indeed guilty of the offence under discussion (§§672–5).

Another relevant case is Ruggiu, the journalist of 'Radio Mille Collines' accused by the ICTR's Prosecutor of 'direct and public incitement to commit genocide and crimes against humanity (persecution)'. He pleaded guilty. ICTR Trial Chamber I found that:

> when examining the acts of persecution which have been admitted by the accused, it is possible to discern a common element. Those acts were direct and public radio broadcasts all aimed at singling out and attacking the Tutsi ethnic group and Belgians on discriminatory grounds, by depriving them of the fundamental rights to life, liberty and basic humanity enjoyed by members of wider society. The deprivation of these rights can be said to have as its aim the death and removal of those persons from the society in which they live alongside the perpetrators, or eventually even from humanity itself. (§22.)

S643

SELECT BIBLIOGRAPHY

GENERAL THEORY

Jescheck, Lehrbuch, 641–739; Fletcher, Basic Concepts, 188–205; Mantovani, 525–78.

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW

Jescheck, Verantwortlichkeit, 268–76; K. Ambos, Der 'Allgemeine Teil', 502–624.

THE ICC STATUTE

K. Ambos, in O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary, 475–92; A. Eser, in Cassese, Gaeta, and Jones, ICC Commentary, 767–822.

INCHOATE CRIMES

General

R. A. Duff, Criminal Attempts (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996); Fletcher, Basic Concepts, 171–87; Ashworth, Principles, 460–89.

International criminal law

K. Ambos, in O. Triffterer, Commentary, 475–92.

3017

S844

OXFORD

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW

3018

5645

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Great Clarendon Street, Oxford OX2 6DP

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship,
and education by publishing worldwide in

Oxford New York

Auckland Bangkok Buenos Aires Cape Town Chennai
Dar es Salaam Delhi Hong Kong Istanbul Karachi Kolkata
Kuala Lumpur Madrid Melbourne Mexico City Mumbai Nairobi
São Paulo Shanghai Taipei Tokyo Toronto

Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press
in the UK and in certain other countries

Published in the United States
by Oxford University Press Inc., New York

© Antonio Cassese, 2003

The moral rights of the author have been asserted
Database right Oxford University Press (maker)

First published 2003

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means,
without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press,
or as expressly permitted by law, or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organizations. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department,
Oxford University Press, at the address above

You must not circulate this book in any other binding or cover and you must impose this same condition on any acquirer

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Data available

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Data applied for

ISBN-13: 978-0-19-925911-3
ISBN-10: 0-19-925911-9

7 9 10 8 6

Typeset in Adobe Minion
by RefineCatch Limited, Bungay, Suffolk
Printed in Great Britain by
Ashford Colour Press Ltd, Gosport, Hampshire

3019

S846

15

LEGAL GROUNDS OF JURISDICTION

15.1 INTRODUCTION

To bring the alleged authors of international crimes to book, States need to have not only laws, statutes, or some sort of judge-made legal regulation punishing those crimes, but also legal provisions authorizing courts to prosecute and punish the alleged perpetrators. These legal provisions normally empower State courts to take proceedings if the offence, its alleged author, or its victim have some sort of link with the State. Indeed, traditionally, States bring alleged perpetrators of international crimes to trial before their courts on the basis of one of three principles: territoriality (the offence has been perpetrated on the State's territory), passive nationality (the victim is a national of the prosecuting State), or active nationality (the perpetrator is a national of the prosecuting State). In contrast, the principle of protection of national interests whereby courts possess jurisdiction over crimes committed abroad by nationals or foreigners when the crimes jeopardize or imperil the State's national interests (for instance, counterfeiting the national currency, planning attacks on the State's security, etc.) is normally not used with respect to international crimes proper, on obvious grounds (States still tend to consider these crimes as not directly relevant to, or affecting, their national interests whenever a national or territorial link is lacking).

Recently the universality principle has emerged, whereby any State is empowered to bring to justice alleged authors of international crimes (in some cases, subject to their being present on the territory of the prosecuting State).

15.2 THE PRINCIPLE OF TERRITORIALITY

The basic principle is that a crime committed in a State's territory is justiciable in that State. In the celebrated Lotus case, the Permanent Court of International Justice stated in 1927 that 'in all systems of law the principle of the territorial character of criminal law is fundamental', although it also added that 'the territoriality of criminal law . . . is not an absolute principle of international law and by no means coincides with territorial sovereignty' (at 20). The Canadian Supreme Court held in United States v. Burns that 'individuals who choose to leave Canada leave behind Canadian law and procedures and must generally accept the local law, procedures and punishments which the foreign state applies to its own residents' (§72). Similarly a US court stated in Rivard v. United States, that '[a]ll the nations of the world recognize the principle that a man who outside of a country wilfully puts in motion a force to take effect in it is answerable at the place where the evil is done' (at 887).

3020

The latter legal proposition is a corollary of the principle of territoriality: even where a crime is committed outside the territory, if its effects will be felt in the territory, then it is amenable to the State's jurisdiction (for example, if, standing outside the territory, I shoot a pistol which kills someone in the territory; or if I manufacture drugs outside the territory and then smuggle them into the territory of the State. In both cases, I can be judged in the State where the effects of the crimes were felt, even though I committed the prohibited acts outside the territory).

The principle is grounded on ideological and political reasons: the need to affirm territorial sovereignty, which evolved in the age of reason and was linked to the consolidation of modern States. This need led States to replace the previous principle of 'personality of laws' (everybody is governed by his national law, wherever he resides) with that of territoriality (what matters is the law of the place where an act is performed).

Montesquieu, Voltaire, Rousseau, and Beccaria insisted on the importance of territoriality in criminal law. The French Revolution confirmed it in the decree of 3–7 September 1792 ('foreigners charged with offences in their homeland may only be tried under the laws of their own country and by their own judges'; consequently, 'no foreigner will be retained on the galleys of France for crimes committed outside French territory'). In 1764 Beccaria, more than any other, developed the theory of territoriality. In his opinion, the adoption of this principle was warranted on two grounds. First of all, as State laws vary, one should only be punished in the place where one has infringed the law. Secondly, it is only just that a crime, which constitutes a violation of the social contract, be punished in the place where the contract was breached.[1]

The principle has numerous advantages. First, the locus delicti commissi (the place where the offence has allegedly been committed) is usually the place where it is easiest to collect evidence. It is therefore considered the forum conveniens, or the appropriate place of trial, as was restated in Eichmann (at 302–3). Secondly, it normally is the place where the rights of the accused are best safeguarded, for—if he is not a foreigner

[1] In his Crimes and Punishments, Beccaria wrote that 'There are those who think, that an act of cruelty committed, for example, at Constantinople, may be punished at Paris; for this abstracted reason, that he who offends humanity, should have enemies in all mankind, and be the object of universal execration; as if the judges were to be the knights errant of human nature in general, rather than guardians of particular conventions between men. The place of punishment can certainly be no other, than that where the crime was committed; for the necessity of punishing an individual for the general good subsists there, and there only.' C. Beccaria, An Essay on Crimes and Punishments, translated from the Italian, 4th edn (London: F. Newberry, 1775), repr. (Brooklyn Village: Branden Press Inc., 1983), at 64. (For the original text, which differs slightly, see C. Beccaria, Dei delitti e delle pene, edited by F. Venturi (Turin: G. Einaudi, 1965), at 71–2.)

S847

3021

SZ48

[illegible]ectingly residing there—he is expected to know the law of the territory, is more likely to know the criminal law in force there as well as his rights as a defendant in a criminal trial. In addition, unless he is a non-resident foreigner, he knows and speaks the language in which the trial unfolds. Thirdly—and this applies in particular to international crimes, whose gravity may have serious repercussions on the society within which the crime has been committed—if the prosecution and punishment occur on the territory where the crime was perpetrated, it is more likely for the cathartic process of criminal trials to have effect: the victims and their families relive their tragedies, the whole society becomes aware of what has happened and is thus put in a position of better coming to terms with, hence of psychologically overcoming, past crimes. Moreover, the judges, jury, and advocates, being members of the community where the crimes took place, are aware of local feelings about the crimes and conscious of the press and public's close scrutiny of their administration of justice; they are thus broadly accountable to the community for the manner in which they dispense justice. Finally, by administering justice over crimes perpetrated in the territory, the territorial State affirms its authority over attacks on peace and security within its bounds; by the same token it helps to deter the commission of future offences.[2]

However, in the case of international crimes, there may be a major obstacle to the territoriality principle: these crimes are often committed by State officials or with their complicity or acquiescence: for example, war crimes committed by servicemen, or torture perpetrated by police officers, or genocide carried out with the tacit approval of State authorities. It follows that State judicial authorities may be reluctant to prosecute State agents or to institute proceedings against private individuals that might eventually involve State organs.

Whenever the territoriality principle is applicable, two problems may arise. First, what should be meant by 'territory' subject to the sovereignty of a State? Here one must turn to the international rules delimiting State territory, with the consequence that offences perpetrated in a State's territorial waters or on its ships or aircraft on the high seas are considered committed on the territory of that State. Similarly, territory comprises space under the control or 'under the jurisdiction' of a State, such as for example territory occupied following an international armed conflict. By contrast, crimes perpetrated in a State's embassy abroad are not carried out on national territory but abroad (hence the contrary view of the Spanish Audiencia nacional in the case of the Guatemalans (at 130), whereby crimes committed in the Spanish embassy in Guatemala were regarded as perpetrated in Spain, was wrong).

[2] In Sawonjuk the British Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) stated that: 'The criminal jurisdiction of the English courts is, generally speaking, territorial. Until enactment of the War Crimes Act 1991 [under which, proceedings may be brought in the UK "against a person in the United Kingdom irrespective of his nationality at the time of the alleged offence" for war crimes committed during the Second World War "in a place which at the time was part of Germany or under German occupation"] the appellant could not be tried here for an offence of murder or manslaughter committed in Byelorussia since he has never been a British subject and the exception made by Section 9 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 to the ordinary rule of territoriality was confined to offences of murder or manslaughter committed outside the United Kingdom by British subjects (at 4).

3022

5849

The second problem relates to the determination of the locus commissi delicti in the case of complex crimes: when the crime is planned in a country and committed in another country, or the crime is committed in a country but takes its effects in another, which is the territory where trial proceedings may be instituted? The tendency of national legal systems is to give priority to the place of commission or to the place where the effects of the crime materialize. Many States have jurisdiction if one of the elements of the offence is committed in the State's territory even if other elements occur abroad. It would seem that there are no international rules on this issue, nor may one infer from national legal systems a uniform regulation of the matter.

Problems specific to international criminal law may arise when the alleged perpetrator of a crime is a State official enjoying immunity from prosecution under national legislation (for instance, the Head of State, the head or a senior member of the government, or a member of parliament). Clearly, if this is the case, national courts are barred from instituting criminal proceedings against the accused, because the latter enjoys personal immunity (ratione personae). It may also be that the alleged perpetrator, whatever his official status, is covered by an amnesty law. In this case, again, the national authorities of the State where the amnesty was granted may be precluded from taking judicial action. By contrast, a foreign court, assuming it has jurisdiction over the crime, may consider that it does not have to recognize the amnesty, particularly if this law turns out to be in conflict with international rules of jus cogens, that is peremptory norms of international law.[3] Thus, whereas national jurisdiction based on the territoriality principle may sometimes fail, other grounds of jurisdiction invoked by foreign courts may prove workable and lead to the prosecution of the alleged culprit.

Among the international treaties providing for grounds of jurisdiction over international crimes, the Convention on Genocide of 1948 should be mentioned. In Article VI it stipulates that persons accused of genocide must be brought to trial before the competent courts of the State where the act has been performed (or before an International Criminal Court, if and when it is established and assuming it has jurisdiction over the crimes in question). This rule, however, has never been applied, except in Rwanda, where national courts prosecuted alleged authors of acts of genocide committed in 1994 alongside the international prosecutions brought before the ICTR. This was only possible due to the rare circumstance that the victims of the genocide, the Tutsi, had seized power in Rwanda (the Tutsi-led party having in 1994 deposed the Hutu-led government that planned and waged the genocide), and were therefore strongly intent on bringing prosecutions for genocide, not least since the fact of the genocide legitimized the minority Tutsis' hold on power.

[3] In England courts are under no obligation to recognize an amnesty granted by another State, irrespective of whether the alleged violation breaches peremptory norms. Since an amnesty is not a judgment, the principle of autrefois acquit/autrefois convict—the English equivalent of the non bis in idem principle—does not apply. This arose in Pinochet—he had been granted an amnesty—but the English courts considered that irrelevant.

3023

S850

15.3 THE PRINCIPLE OF ACTIVE NATIONALITY

Normally the principle of active nationality is implemented in one of two forms. In some States, courts have jurisdiction over certain criminal offences committed by their nationals abroad. This is so, whether or not those offences are criminal under the law of the territorial State, that is, the State in which the conduct constituting the offences under the law of the State of nationality were committed. In this case the underlying motivation is the will of a State that its nationals comply with its law, whether at home or abroad, regardless of what is provided for in the foreign State when the crime is committed. In other countries jurisdiction over crimes committed by nationals abroad is subordinated to the crime being punishable under the law of the territorial State as well (this, for instance, holds true for Egypt). In this case the essential rationale behind the principle is the desire—or constitutional prohibition in many cases—of the State of nationality not to extradite its nationals to the State where the crime has been perpetrated. Hence the law of the State of active nationality must provide for the possibility of trying the accused in that State, so that he does not escape justice altogether. Indeed, it is striking that countries such as the UK, which have no constitutional or other prohibition on the extradition of their nationals, normally do not provide for active nationality as a basis for jurisdiction.[4]

All this holds true, generally speaking, for criminal offences. As for international crimes, States that uphold this ground of jurisdiction do so in order to bow to international dictates, that is to make international law effective by complying with its commands. Thus, they normally do not require that the offence be also punishable by the territorial State, as it is sufficient for the offence to be regarded as an international crime by international rules (be they customary or treaty provisions).

This principle is normally upheld with regard to war crimes, as well as such crimes as torture. Many States, particularly under the pressure arising from the conclusion of treaties setting out international crimes, have passed legislation providing for jurisdiction based on nationality. For instance, in the UK, as a result of the International Criminal Court Act 2001, designed to implement the Statute of the ICC, courts possess jurisdiction over all crimes envisaged in the Court's Statute and committed by British nationals either at home or abroad. The active nationality principle is also laid down in a number of international treaties, which include the 1984 Convention against Torture (Article 5(1)) and various treaties against terrorism.[5]

[4] Nonetheless, as stated above, the courts in England and Wales have jurisdiction over murder and manslaughter committed abroad on the basis of the active nationality principle. See Offences against the Person Act 1861, s. 9. The same is true of High Treason under the Treason Act 1351. These exceptions can be explained on the basis of the gravity of the crimes in question.

[5] See for instance the 1973 Convention on internationally protected persons (Article 6(1)(b)), the 1979 Convention on the taking of hostages (Article 6(2)(e)), the 1980 Convention on the protection of nuclear material (Article 8(1)(b)), the 1988 Convention and Protocol on the security of maritime navigation (Article 6(1)(c)), the 1994 Convention on the Safety of UN and Associated Personnel (Article 10(1)(b)), the 1998

3024

A problem that may arise where jurisdiction is exercised on the basis of the active nationality principle concerns the moment at which the alleged perpetrator must possess the nationality of the prosecuting State: is it when the crime is perpetrated, or when criminal proceedings are instituted? It would seem that most States tend to accept that the nationality may be possessed at either moment, thus broadening the jurisdiction of the State and better ensuring the punishment of international crimes. Other States (for instance, Egypt) require instead that the person be a national of the State at the time of commission of the crime.

One may also notice a tendency of States to broaden this ground by including residents (this applies for instance to the UK with regard to war crimes committed during the Second World War as well as the crimes envisaged in the Statute of the ICC; to Brazil with regard to genocide) or stateless persons residing on the territory of the prosecuting State (this for instance applies to Italy and the Russian Federation).

Some States have passed legislation concerning crimes perpetrated during the Second World War, for the purpose of punishing persons who, whatever their nationality at the time of commission of crimes, have subsequently acquired their nationality, possibly with the hope of sheltering behind their newly acquired nationality.[6]

15.4 THE PRINCIPLE OF PASSIVE NATIONALITY

By virtue of the principle of passive nationality States may exercise jurisdiction over crimes committed abroad against their own nationals. Plainly, the principle is grounded both on: (i) the need to protect nationals living or residing abroad and (ii) a substantial mistrust in the exercise of jurisdiction by the foreign territorial State.

Normally States invoking this ground of jurisdiction also provide that, whenever the accused is abroad, a 'double incrimination' is required for prosecuting a crime, namely that the offence be considered as such both in the territorial State and in the State of the victim. 'Double criminality' is usually considered a procedural requirement of extradition: to extradite from State X to State Y, the crimes in question must be a crime in both States. Normally, where passive nationality is exercised, the State will have to seek extradition of the perpetrator as he will be abroad. Of course, that is not always the case. If the perpetrator, for example a Chilean accused of murdering a Spaniard, is in the State exercising jurisdiction, e.g. Spain, then Spain will be able to proceed against him without going through extradition proceedings and therefore without having to worry about 'double criminality'.

Convention on terrorist bombing (Article 6(1)(c)), the 1999 Convention on the financing of terrorism (Article 7(1)(c)). See also the 2000 Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime (Article 15(2)(b)).

[6] Thus, §§1091 and 2342 of the US Code so provide with regard to genocide and war crimes. In the UK a law was passed in 1991 (the War Crimes Act) whereby proceedings may be brought for war crimes committed during the Second World War against persons who, whatever their nationality at the time of the alleged offence, are British citizens or residents as from 8 March 1990. (This cut-off date was chosen to prevent persons evading the Act by changing their nationality or residence.) Other States such as Australia and Canada have passed similar laws.

S852

Outside extradition law the requirement at issue is intended to avoid prosecuting a person for an act that is not considered a criminal offence by the State where it has been performed; in other words, the rationale for this requirement may be found in the general principle of legality (nullum crimen sine lege) which is common to all national legal systems, in addition to being a general principle of international criminal law (see 7.3). However, as far as international crimes are concerned, this requirement is replaced by the requirement that the offence be considered as an international crime by international law, whatever the content of the legal regulation in the territorial State. In this connection, the decision of the Supreme Court of Argentina delivered in Priebke on 2 November 1995, concerning the extradition to Italy of a German national who had subsequently acquired Argentinian nationality, is pertinent: the Court explicitly held that as the offence of which the defendant stood accused, namely a war crime, was internationally regarded as an international crime, this sufficed for the purpose of the double incrimination principle.[7]

There has been frequent resort to this ground of jurisdiction to prosecute war crimes, particularly after the cessation of hostilities and by the victor State against the vanquished (former) enemies. (Notable departures based on the active nationality principle are the trials instituted in 1902 by US Courts Martial against American servicemen who had fought in the Philippines, the Leipzig trials against Germans, imposed upon Germany by the Allies, and the various trials before US Courts Martial for crimes committed in Vietnam.)

More recently courts have relied upon this jurisdictional ground with regard to crimes against humanity and torture. Significant in this respect are some cases tried in absentia: Astiz, a case brought before French courts (an Argentinian officer had tortured two French nuns in Argentina), as well as some cases brought before Italian courts against Argentinian officers for crimes allegedly perpetrated against Italians (or Argentinians also having Italian nationality) in Argentina.[8] Furthermore, this ground of jurisdiction has been laid down in national legislation with regard to terrorism, for instance in the United States (see §§2331 and 2332 of the Federal Criminal Code), in France (Articles 113–17 of the Criminal Code), and in Belgium. It is also stipulated in a number of international conventions against terrorism[9] and in the 1984 Convention against Torture (Article 5(1)).

Resort to the passive nationality principle is, however, particularly incongruous in the case of international crimes such as for instance those against humanity, and torture. By definition, these are crimes that injure humanity, that is, our sense of [7] Fallos CSJN 318:2148, opinion of Judges Nazareno and O'Connor, §77; opinion of Judge Bossert, §91.

[8] See for instance Suarez Mason and others, at 8–15.

[9] For example, the 1973 Convention on internationally protected persons, the 1979 Convention on hostage-taking, the 1988 Convention and Protocol on maritime safety, the 1994 Convention on the protection of UN agents, the 1997 Convention on terrorist attacks, the 1999 Convention on the financing of terrorism, and the 2000 Convention on transnational organized crime.

3026

humanity, in other words our concept of respect for any human being, regardless of the nationality of the victims. As a consequence, their prosecution should not be based on the national link between the victim and the prosecuting State. This is indeed a narrow and nationalistic standard for bringing alleged criminals to justice, based on the interest of a State to prosecute those who have allegedly attacked one of its nationals. The prosecution of those crimes should instead reflect a universal concern for their punishment; it should consequently be based on such legal grounds as territoriality, universality, or active nationality.

It follows that, as far as such crimes as those against humanity, torture, and genocide are concerned, the passive nationality principle should only be relied upon as a fall-back, whenever no other State (neither the territorial State, nor the State of which the alleged criminal is a national, nor other States acting upon the universality principle) is willing or able to administer international criminal justice. Perhaps this is the reason why in international conventions such as that on torture this ground of jurisdiction, unlike those just mentioned, is envisaged not as an obligation of contracting States but simply as an authorization to prosecute (see Article 5(1)(c) of the 1984 Convention against torture).

Conversely, the ground of jurisdiction under discussion may prove appropriate for such offences as war crimes or terrorism as a discrete offence, where the need to protect national interests and concerns acquires greater relevance.

15.5 THE UNIVERSALITY PRINCIPLE

Under the principle of universality any State is empowered to bring to trial persons accused of international crimes, regardless of the place of commission of the crime, or the nationality of the author or of the victim.

The principle was first proclaimed in customary international law in the seventeenth century, with regard to piracy. Any State was authorized to arrest and bring to justice persons suspected of engaging in piracy, whatever their nationality and the place of commission of the crime. The rationale behind this exceptional authorization to States to depart from the classic principles of territoriality or nationality was the need to fight jointly against a form of criminality that affected all States. Universal jurisdiction was therefore based on a joint concern of all States. Each State knew that by bringing to justice suspected pirates it was acting to protect at the same time its own interests and those of other States.

Subsequently the same jurisdictional ground was included in the 1949 Geneva Conventions on war victims, the 1984 Convention against Torture, and a string of international treaties on terrorism. The rationale for universal jurisdiction in these cases differed, however, from that invoked for piracy. States were not empowered to exercise jurisdiction for the purpose of protecting a joint interest. They were authorized to prosecute and punish, on behalf of the whole international community, persons responsible for a special class of war crimes (grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva ventions), torture or terrorism, with a view to safeguarding universal values. For stance, contracting States were authorized by the 1984 Convention to bring to dice persons who had engaged in torture abroad, in particular in their own country inst their countrymen. The purpose was not to prevent those persons from equally rpetrating torture against nationals of the prosecuting State (in which case one ould have been faced with the protection of a joint interest). The purpose was rather ut of not leaving the crime of torture unpunished, were the territorial State to frain from putting the alleged torturer in the dock. Contracting States were thus uthorized to act as 'universal' guardians against attacks on human dignity taking the rm of torture.

8853

3027

S854

In short, the crimes over which such jurisdiction may be exercised are of such a gravity and magnitude that they warrant their universal prosecution and repression, s the Supreme Court of Israel eloquently held in Eichmann as long ago as 1962. Subsequently the Spanish Constitutional Court, in a judgment of 10 February 1997,[10] and the Spanish national criminal court (Audiencia nacional) in an order of 4 November 1998[11] set out this view.) Thus, any State is authorized to substitute itself for the natural judicial forum, namely the territorial or national State, should neither of them bring proceedings against the alleged author of an international crime.

Under the strong influence and pressure of these international rules, States have begun to lay down the principle of universal jurisdiction in their national legislation: in this connection mention may be made of Spain and Belgium, as well as Germany and Austria.

15.5.1 TWO DIFFERENT VERSIONS OF UNIVERSALITY

The universality principle has been upheld in two different versions, both predicated on the notion that the judge asserting universal jurisdiction so acts in order to substitute for the defaulting territorial or national State: the narrow notion (conditional universal jurisdiction) and the broad notion (absolute universal durisdiction).

A. The narrow notion (conditional universal jurisdiction)

According to the more widespread version, the narrow notion, only the State where the accused is in custody may prosecute him or her (the so-called forum deprehensionis,

[10] See the Judgment of 10 February 1997, in the Panamanian Ship case, at 6, Legal Ground no. 3A. The Court held that the Spanish legislator had intended 'to attribute universal scope to the Spanish jurisdiction over those specific crimes [mentioned in Article 23 of the 1985 Law on Judicial Power], on account both of the gravity of these crimes and the need for international protection'.

[11] Order (auto) of 4 November 1998, in don Adolfo Francisco (Scilingo), at 3, Legal Ground no. 2. The Court held that it was contrary to the spirit of the Genocide Convention to interpret Article 6 of this Convention (which provides that the accused may be tried either by a territorially competent court or by an international court) to the effect that such provision would limit the jurisdiction of States. This interpretation 'would run counter to the fact that genocide is "regarded as a crime of extreme gravity in the whole world and affects directly the international community, indeed all humanity, as is intended by the same Convention".

3028

or jurisdiction of the place where the accused is apprehended). Thus, the presence of the accused on the territory is a condition for the existence of jurisdiction.

This class of jurisdiction is accepted, at the level of customary international law, with regard to piracy.[12] At the level of treaty law it has been upheld with regard to grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and the First Additional Protocol of 1977, torture (under Article 7 of the 1984 Torture Convention), as well as terrorism (see the various UN-sponsored treaties on this matter).[13] These treaties, however, do not confine themselves to granting the power to prosecute and try the accused. They also oblige States to do so, or alternatively to extradite the defendant to a State concerned (the principle of aut prosequi aut dedere).

This version of the universality principle is also applied in the national legislation of some States, such as Austria, Germany, and Switzerland.[14] In France, courts have applied Article 2 of the law of 2 January 1995 implementing the Statute of the ICTY to the effect that, for the application of the relevant provision of the Geneva Conventions on grave breaches, it was required that the offender be on French territory.[15]

B. The broad notion of universality (absolute universal jurisdiction)

Under a different version of the universality principle, a State may prosecute persons accused of international crimes regardless of their nationality, the place of commission of the crime, the nationality of the victim, and even of whether or not the accused is in custody or at any rate present in the forum State. However, as many legal systems do not permit trials in absentia, the presence of the accused on the territory is then a condition for the initiation of trial proceedings. Clearly, this conception of universality allows national authorities to commence criminal investigations of persons suspected [12] See A. Cassese, 'When may Senior State Officials be Tried for International Crimes? Some comments on the Congo v. Belgium Case,' 13 EJIL (2002), at 857–8.

[13] See for instance Article 7 of the Hague Convention for the suppression of unlawful seizure of aircraft of 1970; Article 7 of the Montreal Convention on the suppression of unlawful acts against the safety of civil aviation (sabotage), of 1971; Article 8 of the 1979 Convention against the taking of hostages; Article 7 of the 1988 Convention for the suppression of unlawful acts against the safety of maritime navigation.

[14] Article 65.1.2 of the Austrian Penal Code provides that Austrian criminal law may apply in respect of offences committed abroad, so long as the acts are also punishable in the place where they were performed, and provided that the offender, if a foreigner, is in Austria and may not be extradited to another State (see to this effect Cvjetković, at 5–6). In Germany, Article 6.9 of the Penal Code provides that German criminal law shall apply to offences committed by non-nationals abroad if such offences are made punishable by an international treaty binding upon Germany. Article 7(2).2 of the same Penal Code allows for prosecution of foreigners apprehended in Germany for crimes perpetrated abroad, if they are not extradited (either because a request for extradition was never made, or was refused, or because extradition is not feasible). Articles 108 and 109 of the Swiss Military Penal Code provide for universal jurisdiction over violations of international humanitarian law and the laws and customs of war. Article 6 bis of the Swiss Criminal Code makes the Code applicable to crimes committed abroad, (i) whenever Switzerland is obliged to pursue such crimes under an international treaty, and provided that (ii) the act is also punishable in the State where it was committed, and (iii) the perpetrator is in Switzerland and is not extradited. See the G. case, at 7 and Niyonteze, at 35–41.

[15] See Javor and others Cass. Crim. 26 March 1996, in Bull. No. 132 at 380–3. See also Munyeshyaka, where the French Court of Cassation rightly reversed (at 6–7) a decision of the Nîmes Court of Appeal denying French jurisdiction in spite of the presence of the accused in France (1085–9).

5856

serious international crimes, and gather evidence about these alleged crimes, as soon as such authorities are seized with information concerning an alleged criminal offence. They may thus exercise criminal jurisdiction over such persons, without requiring that the person first be present, even temporarily, in the country. As stressed above, such exercise of jurisdiction is premised on the failure of the territorial or national State to take proceedings, and should therefore not be activated whenever one of those States initiates proceedings. (In this connection, it may be interesting to recall that in Spain, a ruling (auto) by the Audiencia nacional dated 13 December 2000 in the case of the Guatemalan Generals rejected a claim to the exercise of universal jurisdiction by Spanish courts on the basis that the complaints against the accused persons (Guatemalan Generals) could be investigated and tried in Guatemala (at 145), thus the Audiencia interpreted Spanish law to the effect that Spanish jurisdiction is subsidiary, and can only be exercised in case of failure by a State to try serious crimes.)[16]

This principle is laid down in such national legislation as that of Spain and Belgium.[17] It is notable that Regulation no. 2000/15 of the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) also applies this principle in Articles 2.1 and 2.2 with regard to such crimes as genocide, war crimes, crimes against humanity, and torture.

One might also construe Article 7.5 of the Italian Criminal Code (whereby Italian nationals or foreigners who commit abroad any crime 'for which either special legislative provisions or international treaties establish that Italian criminal law shall apply, may be punished under Italian law') to the effect that alleged authors of international crimes may be prosecuted even if they do not find themselves on Italian territory, [16] The subsidiary nature of universality may also follow from international rules. Interestingly, in its decision of 5 November 1998 in Pinochet, the Spanish Audiencia nacional held that universal jurisdiction may have to yield to territorial jurisdiction whenever this is imposed by an international treaty. It stated that, because of the prevalence in Spanish law of treaties over national legislation, Article 6 of the Genocide Convention of 1948 (whereby persons accused of genocide must be tried by courts of the territorial State or by an 'international penal tribunal') entails that in Spain the exercise of other grounds of jurisdiction (including universality) is 'subsidiary in nature', 'so that courts of a State should refrain from exercising jurisdiction over acts of genocide that are being tried by courts of the State where they occurred, or by an international criminal court' (at 3, second legal ground; emphasis added).

[17] In Spain, Article 23 of the 1985 Law on Judicial Power provides that Spanish courts have jurisdiction over crimes committed outside Spain when such crimes constitute genocide, terrorism, or other crimes which Spain is obliged to prosecute under international treaties. However, in Spain trials by default or in absentia are not allowed.

In Belgium, under a Law of 16 June 1993 Belgian courts have jurisdiction over grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and 1977 Protocols, no matter where such offences are committed, by whom or against whom they are committed, and whether or not the offender is on Belgian territory. A law of 3 February 1999 added genocide and crimes against humanity to the international crimes over which Belgian courts possess universal jurisdiction. See the order of the Brussels Investigating Judge in Pinochet (at 281–8), as well as the Rwandan case (where however the accused was already in custody in Belgium), at 2–3.

It should however be noted that in a decision of 6 March 2002 in Sharon and others the Chambre des mises en accusation of the Brussels Court of Appeal held that Belgian legislation must be construed to the effect that it provides only for conditional universal jurisdiction (at 7–20).

3030

provided that: (i) the crimes are envisaged in international treaties ratified by Italy and (ii) under these treaties Italian courts may exercise jurisdiction.[18]

Furthermore, the relevant Spanish case law is worthy of mention. (In addition to a judgment of the Constitutional Court,[19] the decisions of the Audiencia nacional in Pinochet,[20] Scilingo,[21] and Fidel Castro[22] should be recalled.) In addition, under the [18] Recently some national judges attempted to place a broad interpretation on the notion of universal jurisdiction laid down in the Geneva Conventions and the First Additional Protocol of 1977. A French investigating judge unsuccessfully made this attempt on 9 May 1994 (Order of the Juge d'instruction, in Javor and others). (He intended to institute proceedings against Bosnian Serbs who were alleged to have committed grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and who found themselves on the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina.)

See the cases discussed in R. Maison, 'Les premiers cas d'application des dispositions pénales des Conventions de Genève par les juridictions internes', 6 EJIL (1995), 260 ff.

[19] See the judgment of 10 February 1997 (no. 1997/56) in the Panamanian ship case. The ship of the accused (flying Panama's flag) had been chased and seized on the high seas for drug trafficking; the accused had been prosecuted before Spanish courts for one of the crimes over which the Law of 1985 granted universal jurisdiction to those courts. In its lengthy decision, the Constitutional Court took the opportunity to state in an obiter dictum that Article 23, para. 4 of the 1985 Law, granting universal jurisdiction, was in keeping with the Constitution: the Spanish legislator had 'conferred a universal scope (un alcance universal) on the Spanish jurisdiction over those crimes, corresponding to their gravity and to the need for international protection' (Legal Ground no. 3A). Spanish text on CD-Rom of Spanish legislation and case law: EL DERECHO, 2002, Constitutional decisions.

[20] See, in particular, the Order (auto) of 5 November 1998 (no. 1998/22605). In this order the Spanish National High Court (Audiencia nacional) confirmed that national courts have jurisdiction over genocide and terrorism committed in Chile (see Legal Grounds nos 3 and 4; as for torture, where the Court held that Spanish jurisdiction was based on Article 23(4)(g), on the strength of the 1984 Torture Convention, see Legal Ground no. 7). It should be noted that the Court concluded that 'Spain has jurisdiction to judge the acts (conocer de los hechos), based on the principle of universal prosecution of certain crimes . . . enshrined in our domestic law. It also has a legitimate interest (interés legítimo) in exercising that jurisdiction as more than fifty Spaniards were killed or made to disappear in Chile, victims of the repression reported in the orders' (Legal Ground no. 9). In other words, as is apparent from both the words reported and the entire text of the decision, Spanish jurisdiction was not grounded on passive nationality; the presence of Spaniards among the victims of the alleged crimes only amounted to a 'legitimate interest' of Spain in the exercise of universal jurisdiction. This order was confirmed by the decision of the Audiencia nacional of 24 September 1999 (no. 1999/28720). There, the Court reiterated that the Spanish Court had jurisdiction over the crimes attributed to Pinochet, namely genocide, terrorism, and torture (Legal Grounds nos 1 and 10–12), and also stated that Pinochet could not invoke the immunities pertaining to Heads of State, for he no longer held this status (Legal Ground no. 3). For the (Spanish) text of the order and the subsequent decision, see the Spanish case law on CD-Rom, EL DERECHO, 2002, Criminal jurisprudence, as well as on-line: www.derechos.org/nizkor/espana.

[21] See the Order (auto) of 4 November 1998 (no. 1998/22604), very similar in its tenor to that of 5 November referred to supra.

[22] See Order (auto) of 4 March 1999 (no. 1999/2723). The Audiencia nacional held that the Spanish Court could not exercise its criminal jurisdiction, as provided for in Article 23 of the Law on the Judicial Power, for the crimes attributed to Fidel Castro. He was an incumbent head of state, and therefore the provisions of Article 23 could not be applied to him because they were not applicable to heads of state, ambassadors, etc. in office, who thus enjoyed immunity from prosecution on the strength of international rules to which Article 21(2) of the same Law referred (this provision envisages an exception to the exercise of Spanish jurisdiction in the case of 'immunity from jurisdiction or execution provided for in rules of public international law'). See Legal Grounds nos 1–4. The Court also stated that its legal finding was not inconsistent with its ruling in Pinochet, because Pinochet was a former head of state, and hence no longer enjoyed immunity from jurisdiction (see Legal Ground no. 5). For the (Spanish) text of the order, see the CD-Rom, EL DERECHO, 2002, Criminal case law.

S658

interpretation of the German Penal Code propounded by the German Supreme Court (Bundesgerichtshof) in a judgment of 21 February 2001 in Sokolović, the same principle should also apply in Germany, at least whenever the obligation to prosecute is provided for in an international treaty binding upon Germany.[23] One should also mention that in the course of the drafting of the Statute of the International Criminal Court, Germany forcefully expressed the view that international customary law at present authorizes universal jurisdiction over major international crimes.[24] In line with this view, Article 1 of the bill on international criminal law proposed by the German government and now pending before the German Bundesrat (Senate), namely the Entwurf eines Gesetzes zur Einführung des Völkerstrafgesetzbuches, provides that German law applies to all criminal offences against international law envisaged in the law (namely genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes), even when the criminal conduct occurs abroad and does not show any link with Germany.[25]

What are the merits and the flaws of asserting absolute universal jurisdiction? This is a matter that deserves some consideration.

No one will fail to understand the generous ideal underpinning this system. Nonetheless, in my opinion various reasons militate against such absolute universal jurisdiction, at least if resorted to with regard to political or military leaders.[26]

First of all, the existence in some States of national laws granting absolute universal jurisdiction may prompt victims of atrocities to engage in so-called forum-shopping.

[23] The Court noted that in its decision of 29 November 1999, the Court of Appeal (Oberlandsgericht Düsseldorf), following the traditional German case law, had held that a factual link was required by law (legitimierender Anknüpfungspunkt) for a German court to exercise jurisdiction over crimes committed abroad by foreigners. (In the case at issue the offender was a Bosnian Serb accused of complicity in genocide perpetrated in Bosnia.) The Court of Appeal had found this link in the fact that the accused had lived and worked in Germany from 1969 to 1989 and had thereafter regularly returned to Germany to collect his pension and also to seek work. After recalling these findings by the Court of Appeal, the Supreme Court added: 'The Court however inclines, in any case under Article 6 para 9 of the German Criminal Code, not to hold as necessary these additional factual links that would warrant the exercise of jurisdiction . . . Indeed, when, by virtue of an obligation laid down in an international treaty, Germany prosecutes and punishes under German law an offence committed by a foreigner abroad, it is difficult to speak of an infringement of the principle of non-intervention' (judgment of 21 February 2001, 3 StR 372/00, still unreported, at pp. 19–20 of the typescript).

[24] In a document submitted in 1998 to the Preparatory Committee drafting the Statute, Germany stated the following: 'Under current international law, all States may exercise universal criminal jurisdiction concerning acts of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes, regardless of the nationality of the offender, the nationality of the victims, and the place where the crime was committed. This means that, in a given case of genocide, crime against humanity or war crimes, each and every state can exercise its own national criminal jurisdiction, regardless of whether the custodial State, territorial State or any other State has consented to the exercise of such jurisdiction beforehand. This is confirmed by extensive practice' (UN Doc. A/AC.249/1998/DP.2, 23 March 1998).

[25] 'Dieses Gesetz gilt für alle in ihm bezeichneten Straftaten gegen das Völkerrecht, für die in ihm bezeichneten Verbrechen auch dann, wenn die Tat im Ausland begangen wurde und keinen Bezug zum Inland aufweist' (see Bundesrat, Drucksache 29/02, 18 January 2002, Gesetzentwurf der Bundesregierung, at 3; German text on-line at www.bmj.bund.de/images/10185.pdf). See the precisions made in the Commentary, at 29).

[26] See also the critical remarks by J. Verhoeven, 'Vers un ordre repressif universel? Quelques observations', 45 AFDI (1999), 62–3.

3032

In other words, it may attract such victims and induce them to file complaints against alleged perpetrators.[27]

Secondly, if the accused never enters the country where the court is located, or is not extradited to that country, a situation that appears most likely, the judge will end up investigating hundreds of complaints about which he can do nothing.

Thirdly, a judge who decides to go ahead with the trial regardless of the absence of the accused, conducting proceedings in absentia, is likely to be criticized for violating the fundamental rights of the accused. Moreover, the absence of the accused, normally linked to the fact that the State of nationality refuses to extradite, could worsen the problem of establishing the facts because neither the accused nor the State in question will co-operate in the search for evidence.

Fourthly, the power of national judges to issue arrest warrants against foreign State officials may lend itself to abuse if the power is not exercised with caution and is not predicated on two basic conditions: that (i) compelling evidence is available against the accused, and (ii) the person charged with international crimes does not enjoy, or no longer enjoys, personal immunities (this holds true for Heads of State, prime ministers, some senior members of cabinet, and diplomatic agents). Whenever the necessary prudence is not used, the exercise of universal jurisdiction may easily lead to international disputes. This for instance happened in the aforementioned case of the Congolese former foreign minister against whom a Belgian investigating judge had issued an arrest warrant. The Congo filed an application with the International Court of Justice, claiming that the arrest warrant ran counter to the principle of sovereign equality of States and the rules on diplomatic immunity attached to such a State official (see infra, 15.6). Thus, a case pertaining to the criminal responsibility of individuals became the subject of an interstate dispute. In other words, the case was moved from an inter-individual level to that of State-to-State relations. This is contrary to the very logic of international criminal justice.

A further possible criticism is that, if all countries put a system modelled on Belgian (or Spanish) law into practice, the risk of inconsistent rulings would be great and no one would know how to establish priorities between competing courts.

Finally, given the number of diplomatically and politically high-profile cases which would be brought before the courts, the judge would eventually become entangled in roles normally played by the political authorities,[28] with consequent danger of infringing the sound principle of separation of powers.[29]

[27] On this issue see in particular J. F. Flauss, 'Droit des immunités et protection internationale des droits de l'homme', Revue suisse de droit international et de droit européen (2000), at 304.

[28] Take the Pinochet case: it would seem difficult to prove that Pinochet committed genocide in Chile, whereas it would seem that he can be accused of gross violations of human rights including torture; the fact that he was accused of genocide in Spain shows the sort of charges that can be put together, primarily for the purpose of taking into account the Spanish legislation (which provides for universal jurisdiction in the absence of a treaty only for genocide and terrorism).

Arguably these political matters should be left to politicians, legislatures, etc., and not brought before judges.

[29] It is, however, a fact that US courts have for many years asserted universal jurisdiction by default,

5660

Should one conclude that unqualified universal jurisdiction should always be regarded? In fact, there are cases where it may prove fitting: when adopted for international crimes perpetrated by minor defendants. Often the person accused of international crimes does not hold a high position in government. Universal jurisdiction may be envisaged for cases involving low-ranking military officers or other minor State agents, or even civilians, culpable of alleged crimes such as torture, war crimes, crimes against humanity, and so on. With regard to such persons, one is at a loss to see why, if the national or territorial State fails to take proceedings, another State should not be entitled to prosecute and try them in the interests of the whole international community. With regard to these persons, the initiation of criminal proceedings in their absence, the gathering of evidence, and the issue of an arrest warrant would have the advantage of making their subsequent arrest and trial possible. Normally these persons are not well known, and their travels abroad do not make news, unlike those of foreign ministers or Heads of State or military leaders. Hence the only way of bringing them to trial is to issue arrest warrants so that at some stage they are apprehended and handed over to the competent State.

However, let us not be unmindful of the pitfalls of the universality principle. In essence, the search for and collection of evidence may prove extremely difficult, for most of the evidence may be found in the State where the crimes were committed, and the national authorities may not be forthcoming and co-operative, especially if the crimes were committed on behalf of or at the behest of those authorities. Admittedly, the same drawback also occurs with regard to the passive nationality principle: the State of nationality of the alleged perpetrator of the offence is often reluctant to hand over the relevant evidence to the State of nationality of the victim (whereas when the active nationality principle is resorted to the reverse is true, because the State of the victim is normally all too glad to co-operate in the prosecution of the perpetrator). It would seem however, that in the case of universal jurisdiction the danger or likelihood of lack of judicial co-operation by the foreign State is much greater. States tend to dislike the exercise of extraterritorial jurisdiction when even the link constituted by the presence in the forum State of the perpetrator or the victim is lacking. Hence, whenever faced with such a situation, they tend not to co-operate.

Admittedly in civil proceedings, over serious violations of international law perpetrated by foreigners abroad (see the Alien Tort Claims Statute and the Filartiga-Peña Irala case. See, e.g., L. F. Damrosch, 'Enforcing International Law through Non-Forcible Measures', 269 HR (1997), 161–7). Although civil jurisdiction is less intrusive than criminal jurisdiction, when it is exercised over foreigners who possess official status (for instance, high-ranking State officials), it nevertheless amounts to interference with the internal organization of foreign States. Whether or not this trend of US courts is objectionable as a matter of policy, or on legal grounds, it is a fact that it has not been challenged, or in other words has been acquiesced in, by other States. This implicit acceptance through non-contestation would seem to evidence the generally shared legal conviction that, where there are serious and blatant breaches of universal values, national courts are authorized to take action, subject to fulfilment of some fundamental requirements, such as ensuring a fair trial. (Admittedly there is a conspicuous difference between civil and criminal suits: in civil suits only money is at stake whereas in a criminal trial, the accused may be deprived of his liberty for a long time. So States may be prepared to tolerate civil suits of this nature, but shrink from allowing criminal trials.)

3034

15.6 OBJECTIONS TO UNIVERSALITY

The notion of universality has been subjected to two criticisms. The first is that State courts would interfere in the internal affairs of another State, in violation of a fundamental principle of international relations. For example, Chile put forward this argument in a memorandum to the UK on the possible extradition of General Pinochet to Spain.

It is clear that here we are witnessing a confrontation between two different conceptions of the international community. The first is an archaic conception, under which non-interference in the internal affairs of other States constitutes an essential pillar of international relations. The second is a modern view, based on the need to further universal values; it implies that national judges are authorized to circumvent, if not remove, the shield of sovereignty.

A Spanish court, the Audiencia nacional, in two recent cases (don Alfonso Francisco (Scilingo) (at Legal ground no. 10) and don Augusto (Pinochet) (at Legal ground no. 9)) as well as the German Federal High Court (in the Sokolović case) (at 20), have already rejected this objection, without however giving reasons. It would nevertheless appear that they considered that courts, when they stand in, under either international law or national legislation, for a defaulting foreign State and hand down decisions relating to crimes committed by foreigners against foreigners abroad, protect fundamental values recognized by the whole international community.

A second objection is that national courts would hinder international diplomatic relations, whenever the suspect or the accused is a State agent in office, all the more so when he is a high representative such as a Head of State or government, a foreign affairs minister, etc. In this connection, the case of Fidel Castro[31] is relevant, for in that case a Spanish court propounded a balanced and legally apposite solution to this intricate matter. The case dealt with charges laid against an incumbent Head of State, Fidel Castro; the Spanish court ruled that, as long as he was in office, Fidel Castro could not be prosecuted in Spain, not even for international crimes envisaged under the Spanish law of 1985.

The same objection against the exercise of universal jurisdiction was raised by the Congo against Belgium before the International Court of Justice, in the Case [31] See Order (auto) of 4 March 1999 (no. 1999/2723). The Audiencia nacional held that the Spanish Court could not exercise its criminal jurisdiction, as provided for in Article 23 of the Law on the Judicial Power, over the crimes attributed to Fidel Castro. Since Castro was an incumbent Head of State, the provisions of Article 23 could not be applied to him. This was because they were not applicable to Heads of State, ambassadors, etc. in office, who thus enjoyed immunity from prosecution on the strength of international rules to which Article 21(2) of the same Law referred. (This provision envisages an exception to the exercise of Spanish jurisdiction in the case of 'immunity from jurisdiction or execution provided for in rules of public international law'.) See Legal Grounds nos 1–4. The Court also stated that its legal finding was not inconsistent with its ruling in Pinochet, because Pinochet was a former Head of State, and hence no longer enjoyed immunity from jurisdiction (see Legal Ground no. 5). For the (Spanish) text of the order, see the CD-Rom, EL DERECHO, 2002, Criminal case law.

5862

Concerning the Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000. A Belgian investigating judge, at the Brussels Tribunal de Première Instance, had issued an international arrest warrant against the foreign minister of the Democratic Republic of Congo for grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and crimes against humanity. The crimes of which the Congolese minister was accused, following complaints by Congolese and Belgian nationals, had allegedly been committed on Congolese territory against Congolese nationals. The accused was not on Belgian territory when the arrest warrant was issued: thus Belgium was not even the forum deprehensionis.[2] In its judgment of 14 February 2002, the Court made an important contribution to a clarification of the law of (what one ought correctly to term) personal immunities (including inviolability) of foreign ministers. This is an area where State practice and case law are lacking. To reach its legal findings, the Court did not, therefore, have to establish the possible content of customary law. Rather, it logically inferred from the rationale behind the rules on personal immunities of senior State officials, such as Heads of State or government (or diplomatic agents), that such immunities must perforce prevent any prejudice to the 'effective performance' of their functions. They therefore bar any possible interference with the official activity of foreign ministers. It follows that an incumbent foreign minister is immune from jurisdiction, even when on a private visit or when acting in a private capacity while holding office. Clearly, not only the arrest and prosecution of a foreign minister while on a private visit abroad, but also the mere issuance of an arrest warrant, may seriously hamper or jeopardize the conduct of international affairs of the State for which that person acts as a foreign minister.

15.7 IS THE EXERCISE OF UNIVERSAL JURISDICTION ALLOWED BY CUSTOMARY INTERNATIONAL LAW?

It would appear that the first case in which a person accused of crimes against humanity was tried in a State with which he had no formal links was Eichmann (although it could be argued that most of the surviving victims, and the relatives of victims, of Eichmann's offences were in Israel). It is extremely significant that no State concerned protested against that trial: neither the two German States nor the countries on whose territory the acts of genocide planned or organized by Eichmann had been perpetrated, nor the States of which the victims of genocide were nationals. Thus, States did not challenge the principle enunciated in 1962 by the Supreme Court of Israel whereby 'the peculiarly universal character of these crimes [against humanity] vests in every State the authority to try and punish anyone who participated in their commission' (at 287). The Court concluded as follows:

[2] See the relevant documents submitted by the parties in the case brought before the ICJ by Congo versus Belgium in Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000. (Those documents are summarized in the oral pleadings: see the verbatim records of the Court's sittings of 21 and 23 November 2000, www.icj-cij.org.)

3036

Not only do all the crimes attributed to the appellant bear an international character, but their harmful and murderous effects were so embracing and widespread as to shake the international community to its very foundations. The State of Israel therefore was entitled, pursuant to the principle of universality of jurisdiction and in the capacity of a guardian of international law and an agent for its enforcement, to try the appellant. (At 304.)

This proposition was taken up by US courts in Yunis (at 903) and in two decisions in Demjanuk (at 27–43 and 23–7) and, in Pinochet, by Lords Browne-Wilkinson and Millet. Lord Browne-Wilkinson stated that 'the jus cogens nature of the international crime of torture justifies States in taking universal jurisdiction over torture wherever committed' (837–8). Lord Millet stated that 'crimes prohibited by international law attract universal jurisdiction under customary international law if two criteria are satisfied. First, they must be contrary to a peremptory norm of international law so as to infringe jus cogens. Secondly, they must be so serious and on such a scale that they can justly be regarded as an attack on the international legal order' (at 911–12). These propositions were taken up and restated by an Argentinian judge in Simon Julio, Del Cerro Juan Antonio (at 55–6).

As we shall see, some States have, at least recently, passed legislation applying the universality principle, and their courts have begun to apply this principle. The acceptance by States of the exercise of 'universal' jurisdiction by Israel, as well as the most recent practice of some States, and the authoritative opinions of some judges of the International Court of Justice in the aforementioned Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000[33] would seem to be in line with the Lotus principle (whereby [33] In their Joint Separate Opinion, Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, and Buergenthal set out a series of conditions for the exercise of absolute universal jurisdiction. These conditions are as follows: (i) the State intending to prosecute a person must first 'offer to the national state of the prospective accused person the opportunity itself to act upon the charges concerned'; (ii) the charges may only be laid by a prosecutor or investigating judge who is fully independent of the government; (iii) the prosecution must be initiated at the request of the persons concerned, for instance at the behest of the victims or their relatives; (iv) criminal jurisdiction is exercised over offences that are regarded by the international community as the most heinous crimes; (v) jurisdiction is not exercised as long as the prospective accused is a foreign minister (Head of State, or diplomatic agent) in office; after he leaves office, it may be exercised over 'private acts' (see paras 59–60 and 79–85).

Some of the conditions may however give rise to objection. For instance, one fails to see why, in the first of the five conditions set out by the three judges, it is required that 'the national state of the prospective accused' be 'offered' the opportunity to act upon the charges. Why should one leave aside the territorial State (normally the forum conveniens) or the State of which the victim is a national? In addition, why should one envisage that the State exercising universal jurisdiction 'offer' to another State the chance to prosecute the suspect? To make such an offer would involve shifting the whole matter from the judiciary to foreign ministries and might imply making a bilateral agreement. It would be easier to require that the court intending to exercise jurisdiction should first establish whether courts of the territorial or national State have (deliberately) failed to prosecute the suspect at issue; only then should a court proceed to assert universal jurisdiction.

It is submitted that also the fifth condition should be couched differently, to take account of the existence of the customary rule referred to in the text above, and which is intended to remove functional immunity in the case of international crimes.

States are authorized to prosecute extraterritorial offences provided that by so doing they do not breach a prohibitive rule of international law).[1]

15.3 TRENDS IN THE EXERCISE OF NATIONAL CRIMINAL JURISDICTION

15.3.1 THE PROSECUTION AND PUNISHMENT OF WAR CRIMES

The merits and shortcomings of the penal repression of international crimes may be best assessed if considered in the light of the fundamental distinction drawn by Röling, with regard to war crimes, between 'individual' and 'system' criminality.[2] The former encompasses war crimes committed by combatants on their own initiative and for 'selfish' reasons (rape, looting, murder, and so on). The latter refers to war crimes perpetrated on a large scale, chiefly to advance the war effort or for ideological reasons, at the request or at least with the encouragement or toleration of the government authorities (killing civilians to spread terror, refusing quarter, using prohibited weapons, engaging in torture of captured enemies to obtain information, and so on). It also refers to other classes of international crimes, the perpetration of which by single individuals presupposes the complicity, participation, toleration, or acquiescence of State authorities, or which is even effected by State agents themselves. I am referring to crimes against humanity, genocide, or egregious forms of terrorism.

[1] The Lotus case (1927) is a milestone in the history of international criminal law. In that case a collision occurred between the French mail steamer Lotus and the Turkish collier Boz-Kourt on the high seas off Mytilene. Eight Turkish sailors and passengers on the collier died, while the Lotus, which was carrying French nationals, escaped with minor damage. The Turkish authorities arrested the officer of the watch on the Lotus, Lieutenant Demons, and the captain of the Boz-Kourt, Hassan Bey, who were subsequently tried by the Turkish courts. Both were convicted of manslaughter, Demons being sentenced to eight days' imprisonment and a fine of 22 Turkish pounds, and Hassan Bey to a month's imprisonment and a fine of 44 Turkish pounds. The French government protested against the exercise of jurisdiction by the Turkish courts, arguing that the case fell exclusively within the jurisdiction of France, the flag State of the Lotus. The Turkish government contended that the Turkish courts were entitled to exercise jurisdiction under the principle of passive personality, since the victims were Turkish nationals. The case was submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice, which held that Turkey had not acted contrary to international law. The Court found that international law does not prohibit a State from exercising jurisdiction over foreigners in respect of offences committed outside its territory, merely because the offender is a foreigner and the offence was committed outside its territory. Thus, international law leaves States a wide measure of discretion which is only limited in certain cases by prohibitive rules; as regards other cases, every State remains free to adopt the principles which it regards as best and most suitable (at 19). The Court then asked itself whether under international law there was a principle which would have prohibited Turkey, in the circumstances of the case at issue, from prosecuting the French officer (at 20) and answered in the negative (22–31).

[2] H. von A. Röling, 'The Significance of the Laws of War', in A. Cassese (ed.), Current Problems of International Law (Milan: Giuffrè, 1975), at 147–49.

5864

3038

S865

Normally 'individual criminality' is repressed by the culprit's national authorities. (Army commanders do not like this sort of misbehaviour, for it is bad for the morale of the troops and makes for a hostile enemy population.) By contrast, 'system criminality' as a rule is only repressed by international tribunals or by the courts of the adversary. There are, of course, exceptions, such as some cases of war crimes committed by US armed forces in the Philippines in 1900–1, the crimes against the Armenians repressed, in a few instances, by courts of the Ottoman Empire in 1919–20, or, in more recent times, the Calley case, 'a typical example of system criminality', in which the prosecution of Calley was urged upon the US authorities by American and foreign public opinion (but, revealingly, Calley received a very light sentence, which he served under house arrest, and was then pardoned by President Nixon; this seems to bear out that his acts were part of 'system criminality' as they were to a large extent tolerated or condoned by the US government).

By and large, repression of 'individual criminality' is a more frequent occurrence than that of 'system criminality', for the simple reason that the latter involves an appraisal and condemnation of a whole system of government, of misbehaviour involving the highest authorities of a country.

Apart from this distinction, one may however note that, in the case of war crimes, in time of war belligerents endeavour as far as possible to refrain from trying enemy combatants for fear of retaliation. Once the war is over, victor States tend to prosecute and punish crimes committed by the enemy forces against nationals of those victor States (on the passive nationality principle), whereas the contrary is not true. (There are however exceptions, such as the aforementioned criminal proceedings instituted in 1902 before US Courts Martial for crimes committed by American troops in the Philippines). Victor States often pass legislation granting amnesty to their own armed forces with regard to any war crime they may have perpetrated. After the First World War, once it proved impossible to set up an international tribunal for the punishment of German authors of war crimes, Germany was obliged to punish German military people accused by the Allies of war crimes. The Leipzig Supreme Court took upon itself the task of so doing, in 1921. In some cases Allied courts brought to trial Germans accused of war crimes, but no such court prosecuted and tried nationals of the Allies. Similarly, after the Second World War, in addition to establishing the two ad hoc International Tribunals (for the principal German and Japanese war criminals), the Allies passed Control Council Laws authorizing (in fact, obliging) German courts to try Germans. Various Allied courts also tried Germans. In Italy courts tried Germans and Italians who had collaborated with them, whereas partisans were granted amnesty. (Subsequently the amnesty was extended to Fascists and collaborators.) Similarly, in France in 1944 a law was passed granting amnesty to the French members of the Resistance, whereas trials were authorized for both the enemy and the French who had collaborated with Germans.

Recently war crimes have been tried under special national legislation, such as that enacted in the UK, Canada, or Australia, relating to a specific set of crimes, namely those committed by Nazis during the Second World War (see, for instance, the Sawoniuk case, brought before British courts:[36] the accused, a Polish-Byelorussian resident of the UK, was convicted of murder of unknown Jewish women in a village of Byelorussia occupied by the Germans; at 506–9).

3039

It must be added that, strikingly, for about forty years the innovative and forward-looking repressive system instituted by the 1949 Geneva Conventions concerning the universal jurisdiction of any State party over grave breaches of the Conventions has remained unapplied. Only after the establishment of the ICTY and the ICTR have States commenced to resort to it. Thus, German, Danish, and Swiss courts have made use of universal jurisdiction by prosecuting and trying persons who allegedly perpetrated grave breaches in the former Yugoslavia.[37]

These cases, however, still constitute exceptions. As a rule States have confined themselves to taking criminal proceedings based on the more traditional grounds of jurisdiction. In practice they have instituted proceedings only against alleged authors of crimes committed on their territory or against their nationals (or persons living on their territory and having acquired their nationality).

It should be added that many States still tend to claim exclusive jurisdiction over their nationals when they commit war crimes at home or abroad. Thus for instance, in the USA the territoriality principle is widely accepted for criminal offences.[38] However, when it comes to prosecuting US military personnel, the USA refuses to accept foreign jurisdiction, either by entering into agreements with foreign States to the effect that the national jurisdiction of the accused prevails (this also applies to NATO agreements) or by refraining from participating in such international treaties as the Statute of the ICC.

15.8.2 THE PROSECUTION AND PUNISHMENT OF OTHER INTERNATIONAL CRIMES

As far as crimes against humanity and genocide are concerned, once trials of such crimes committed during the Second World War were over, in practice no or very little use has been made of the relevant international rules. In relatively recent times French courts tried Germans or French collaborators accused of having committed crimes against humanity during the Second World War (see the Barbie, Papon, and Touvier cases). In contrast, they have declined to exercise criminal jurisdiction over crimes against humanity committed by the French in Indochina in 1952–4, on legalistic grounds (chiefly a wrong interpretation of a resolution of the UN General [36] [2000] Crim. LR, at 506–9.

[37] See the Djajić and Jorgić cases in Germany, the Saric case in Denmark, Javor and Munyeshuyka in France, and the G. case in Switzerland.

[38] In Yapp v. Reno and in Extradition of Charles Philip Smith, US courts pointed out that 'When an American citizen commits a crime in a foreign country, he cannot complain if required to submit to such modes of trial and to such punishment as the laws of that country prescribe for its own people, unless a different mode be provided by treaty stipulations between that country and the United States' (at 1565 and 965).

Assembly and of the French law that referred to it: see the Boudarel case). Genocide has been brought before Israeli courts in Eichmann (based on the principle of universal jurisdiction, which however in fact largely coincided with that of passive nationality). German courts have pronounced upon genocide in a few cases, all relating to crimes committed by Serbs in the former Yugoslavia (see Djajić, Jorgić, and Sokolović, already referred to above). Courts in Rwanda are now trying alleged perpetrators of genocide.[39]

Torture as a discrete crime has been the subject of important proceedings in Pinochet, based on various grounds of jurisdiction (that of the custodial State, for British courts; the principle of universality in conjunction with that of passive nationality, for Spanish courts). However, for all its theoretical and principled significance, this case has not led to a proper trial, not even in Chile. (See the decision of the Court of Appeal of Santiago of 5 June 2000 in Pinochet.)

15.8.3 CONCLUDING REMARKS

In sum, national courts are still loath to bring to justice persons accused of international crimes. The fact that very often such crimes are perpetrated by State agents, or with their support, tolerance, or acquiescence, accounts for the hesitation or reluctance of courts to bring to book nationals accused of such crimes. Furthermore, when it is foreigners who allegedly perpetrate those crimes, the fear of meddling in the domestic affairs of other States holds national courts back. Generally speaking, these courts are still dominated by nationalistic, short-term interests. They are still far from realizing community concerns. Few national judges share the sense that it is necessary to vindicate and judicially to enforce respect for fundamental values, wherever they may have been breached.

SELECT BIBLIOGRAPHY

GENERAL

R. Wolfrum, 'The Decentralized Prosecution of International Offences Through National Courts', in Y. Dinstein and M. Tabory (eds), War Crimes in International Law (The Hague, Boston, London: Kluwer, 1996), 233–49; J. I. Charney, 'International Criminal Law and the Role of Domestic Courts', 95 AJIL (2001), 120–4.

LEGAL GROUNDS OF JURISDICTION

H. Donnedieu de Vabres, Les principes modernes du droit pénal international (Paris: Sirey, 1928), 1–170; J. L. Brierly, 'The Nature of War Crimes Jurisdiction' (1944) in J. L. Brierly, The Basis of Obligation in International Law and Other Papers (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1958), 297–305; E. A.

[39] Some courts have dealt with genocide only tangentially. See for instance Hipperson and others, at 87–9, Mugesera, at 529–33, and Niyonteze, decision of 26 May 2000, at 28–32.

S668

Mann, 'The Doctrine of Jurisdiction in International Law', 111 HR (1964–I), 82–95; C. Lombois, Droit penal international, 2nd edn (Paris: Dalloz, 1979), 302–419; A. Huet and R. Koering-Joulin, Droit pénal international, 2nd edn (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 2001), 193–223.

THE PRINCIPLE OF TERRITORIALITY

G. E. Langemeijer, 'Le principe de territorialité', in Le droit Pénal International—Recueil d'études en hommage à J. M. van Bemmelen (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1965), 17–37.

THE UNIVERSALITY PRINCIPLE

K. Mikliszanskli, 'Le système de l'universalité du droit de punir et le droit pénal subsidiaire', 1 Revue de science criminelle et droit pénal comparé (1936), 331–41; H. Donnedieu de Vabres, 'Le système de répression universelle, 18 Revue de droit international privé (1922–3), 533–64; H. Donnedieu de Vabres, 'De la piraterie au genocide—Les nouvelles modalités de la répression universelle', Mélanges Ripert (Paris: L.G.D.J, 1950), I, 226ff.; G. Guillaume, 'La compétence universelle. Formes anciennes et nouvelles', Mélanges Levasseur (Paris: Litec, 1992), 23–37; K. Randall, 'Universal Jurisdiction under International Law', Texas Law Review, 66 (1988), 786–91; B. Stern, 'A propos de la compétence universelle', Liber Amicorum Judge Mohammed Bedjaoui (The Hague, London, Boston: Kluwer, 1999), 735–53; J. Verhoeven, 'Vers un ordre répressif universel? Quelques observations', 55 AFDI (1999), 62–3; G. de la Pradelle, 'La compétence universelle', in Ascensio, Decaux, and Pellet (eds), Droit international pénal, 905–18; M. Henzelin, Le principe de l'universalité en droit pénal international (Basle, Geneva, Munich: Helbing and Lictenhahn, 2000); L. Reydams, 'Universal Criminal Jurisdiction: the Belgian State of Affairs', 11 CLForum (2000), 183–216; A. Hays Butler, 'The Doctrine of Universal Jurisdiction: A Review of the Literature', 11 CLForum (2000), 353–73; H. A. Kissinger, 'The Pitfalls of Universal Jurisdiction', 80 Foreign Affairs (2001), 86–92; J. R. W. D. Jones, 'Immunity and "Double Criminality": General Augusto Pinochet before the House of Lords', in S. Yee and W. Tieya (eds), International Law in the Post-Cold War World (London and New York: Routledge, 2001), 254–67; D. Vandermeersch, 'La compétence universelle', in A. Cassese and M. Delmas-Marty (eds), Juridictions nationales, 589–611.

TRENDS IN THE PROSECUTION OF INTERNATIONAL CRIMES:

(1) GENERAL

I. A. Lediakh, 'The Application of the Nuremberg Principles by Other Military Tribunals and National Courts', in G. Ginsburgs and V. N. Kudriavtsev (eds) The Nuremberg Trial and International Law (Dordrecht, Boston, London: Nijhoff, 1990), 263–83. R. Wedgwood, 'National Courts and the Prosecution of War Crimes' in Kirk McDonald and Swaak-Goldman (eds), Substantive and Procedural Aspects, I, 391–415.

(2) PROSECUTION OF CRIMES IN GERMANY

H. Meyrowitz, La répression par les tribunaux allemands des crimes contre l'humanité et de l'appartenance à une organisation criminelle, en application de la loi no. 10 du Conseil de contrôle allié (Paris: LGDJ, 1960); R. Henkys, Die Nationalsozialistischen Gewaltverbrechen. Geschichte und Gericht (Stuttgart: Kreuz Verlag, 1964); A. Rückerl (ed.), NS-Prozesse nach 25 Jahren Strafverfolgung: Möglichkeiten—Grenzen—Ergebnisse (Heidelberg-Karlsruhe: C. F. Müller Verlag, 1971); A. Rückerl, The Investigation of Nazi Crimes 1945–1978—A Documentation

3042

S669

Heidelberg, Karlsruhe: C. F. Müller Verlag, 1979); A. Rückerl, NS—Verbrechen vor Gericht. Versuch einer Vergangenheitsbewältigung (Heidelberg-Karlsruhe: C. F. Müller Verlag, 1982); D. H. Kitterman, 'Those Who Said "No!": Germans Who Refused to Execute Civilians during World War II', 11 German Studies Review (1988), 241–54; H. Ostendorf, 'Die—widersprüchlichen—Auswirkungen der Nürnberger Prozesse auf die westdeutsche Justiz' in G. Hankel, G. Stuby (eds), Strafgerichte gegen Menschheitsverbrechen (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 1995), 73–97; K. Ambos, S. Wirth, 'Genocide and War Crimes in the Former Yugoslavia Before German Criminal Courts', in H. Fischer, C. Kress, S. R. Lüder (eds), International and National Prosecution of Crimes Under International Law—Current Developments (Berlin: Berlin Verlag Arno Spitz, 2000), 769–97.

(3) PROSECUTION OF CRIMES IN FRANCE

E. Schwinge, 'Angehörige der ehemaligen deutschen Wehrmacht und der SS vor französischen Militärgerichten', 2 Monatsschrift für deutsches Recht (1949), 650–4; A. Eiselé, 'Réflexions sur les procès de criminels de guerre en France' in 31 Revue de droit pénal et de criminologie (1950–1), 305–17; H. H. Jescheck, 'Zum Oradour-Prozess', 8 Juristenzeitung (1953) 156–7; J. P. Maunoir, La repression des crimes de guerre devant les tribunaux français et alliés (Geneva: Editions Médecine et hygiène, 1956).

(4) PROSECUTION OF CRIMES IN ITALY

G. Vassalli, G. Sabatini, Il collaborazionismo e l'amnistia politica nella giurisprudenza della Corte di Cassazione (Rome: Edizioni "La Giustizia penale", 1947) G. Schreiber, Deutsche Kriegsverbrechen in Italien (Munich: O. Beck, 1996); R. Ricci, 'Processo alle stragi naziste? Il caso ligure. I fascicoli occultati e le illegittime archiviazioni', in 7. Storia e Memoria (1998), 119–64; F. Focardi, 'La questione della punizione dei criminali di guerra in Italia dopo la fine del Secondo Conflitto Mondiale' in 80 Quellen und Forschungen aus Italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken, 2000, 543–624; P. Gaeta, 'War Crimes Before Italian Criminal Courts: New Trends' in H. Fischer, C. Kress, S. R. Lüder (eds), International and National Prosecution of Crimes Under International Law cit., 751–68.

(5) PROSECUTION OF CRIMES BY BRITISH COURTS

R. J. Pritchard, 'The Gift of Clemency following British War Crimes Trials in the Far East, 1946–1948' 8 CLForum (1996), 15–50.

(6) PROSECUTION OF CRIMES IN BELGIUM

L. Reydams, 'Prosecuting Crimes Under International Law on the Basis of Universal Jurisdiction: The Experience of Belgium', in H. Fischer, C. Kress, S. R. Lüder (eds), International and National Prosecution of Crimes Under International Law—Current Developments (Berlin: Berlin Verlag Arno Spitz, 2000), 799–816; D. Vandermeersch, 'Droit belge', in Cassese and Delmas-Marty (eds), Juridictions nationales, 69–119.

(7) PROSECUTION OF CRIMES IN THE USA

T. Taylor, Nuremberg and Vietnam: an American Tragedy (Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1970); N. G. Cooper, 'My Lai and Military Justice—To What Effect?' in 59 Mil. Law Review (1973), 93–127; J. F. Addicott, 'The lessons of My Lai', 31 RDMDG (1992), 75–107; G. D. Solis, Son Thang—An American War Crime (Annapolis, Maryland: Naval Institute Press, 1997).

3043

S870

International Criminal

CASES & COMMENTARY

Antonio Cassese, Guido Acquaviva, Mary Fan, and Alex Whiting

3044

5671

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS
Great Clarendon Street, Oxford OX2 6DP
Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship,
and education by publishing worldwide in
Oxford New York
Auckland Cape Town Dar es Salaam Hong Kong Karachi
Kuala Lumpur Madrid Melbourne Mexico City Nairobi
New Delhi Shanghai Taipei Toronto
With offices in
Argentina Austria Brazil Chile Czech Republic France Greece
Guatemala Hungary Italy Japan Poland Portugal Singapore
South Korea Switzerland Thailand Turkey Ukraine Vietnam
Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press
in the UK and in certain other countries
Published in the United States
by Oxford University Press Inc., New York
© Antonio Cassese, Guido Acquaviva, Mary Fan, and Alex Whiting, 2011
The moral rights of the authors have been asserted
Crown copyright material is reproduced with the permission of the Controller, HMSO (under the terms of the Click Use licence)
Database right Oxford University Press (maker)
All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means,
without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press,
or as expressly permitted by law, or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department,
Oxford University Press, at the address above
You must not circulate this book in any other binding or cover and you must impose the same condition on any acquirer
British Library Cataloguing-in-Publication Data
Data available
Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Data available
Typeset by Newgen Imaging Systems (P) Ltd, Chennai, India
Printed in Great Britain
on acid-free paper by
Ashford Colour Press Ltd, Gosport, Hampshire
ISBN 978-0-19-957678-4
1 3 5 7 9 10 8 6 4 2

3045

S172

6

AIDING AND ABETTING

Although aiding and abetting as a mode of liability addresses the most marginal form of criminal participation, it can be a powerful weapon in the international prosecutor's arsenal. Considerable attention has been paid to the potentially broad reaches of joint criminal enterprise liability, or even co-perpetration, but aiding and abetting also has the particular ability to touch conduct at the edges of criminal activity. Because of the lower showing required (depending on the court) both for the actus reus and the mens rea of aiding and abetting, this mode of liability can capture the acts of perpetrators who play a more peripheral, but nonetheless important, role in the commission of atrocities.

Perhaps a better way to think about aiding and abetting, though, is not as a mode of liability that operates at the periphery, but rather as one that has the potential to fill gaps in the liability scheme. While other modes of liability directly address the conduct of those at the top of a criminal organization (who order, plan or organize criminal conduct) or that of direct perpetrators at the bottom of the group (who commit the acts), aiding and abetting can reach the participation of actors in between: those many individuals who contribute in small but cumulatively essential ways to the commission of mass crimes. In the excerpts below, the courts frequently show an acute understanding of how large-scale international crimes occur; they require not just planners and perpetrators, but numerous actors who participate – sometimes simply by doing their 'job' or because they want to get along or are unwilling to object to those more powerful – and who together make it possible for the crime to occur on a massive level. Thus, through the analysis of the most exiguous mode of liability, courts grapple with some of the hardest and most essential questions about the responsibility of small and ordinary actors in international crimes.

Aiding and abetting can fill other gaps as well. Sometimes senior leaders will participate in the commission of crimes simply by giving their tacit approval and encouragement, conduct that may best be characterized as aiding and abetting. Additionally, aiding and abetting can sometimes fill evidentiary gaps. Investigators and prosecutors of massive crimes often have limited access to evidence and few investigative tools (particularly as compared to domestic authorities). Accordingly, even with regard to more central participants, sometimes the available evidence will support no more than a charge of aiding and abetting.

The evolution of the concept of aiding and abetting has seen expansion followed by some arguable retrenchment, as one can note in the excerpts below. The World War II cases applied the concept of aiding and abetting as accessory liability, but did not fully articulate its contours and sometimes applied it unevenly. The modern ad hoc international tribunals fully fleshed out the concept, ultimately holding that an aider and abetter is one who makes a substantial contribution to the commission of a crime, with the knowledge that his or her acts will assist in the commission of the crime in question, but not necessarily with an intent to promote the crime. This articulation of the concept was particularly useful to prosecutors because it perfectly captured the conduct of actors who participated in crimes because doing so fitted in with their bureaucratic or organizational function, but without any actual desire or intent to further the crimes. Additionally, intent can often be the most difficult element to prove, since it usually must be inferred, and so the diminished intent requirement of aiding and abetting at the ad hoc tribunals allowed it to serve as a useful backup charge to charges of more direct and intentional participation in crimes.

3046

S873

The ICCSt., however, appears to have retreated somewhat from the broad concept developed at the ad hoc tribunals. Article 25(3)(c) assigns liability to a person who, '[f]or the purpose of facilitating the commission of [...] a crime [under the Statute], aids, abets or otherwise assists in its commission or its attempted commission, including providing the means for its commission'. On its face, this formulation does not include a requirement that the contribution be 'substantial', but it appears to require that an aider and abettor not simply have 'knowledge' of the main perpetrator's intent, but share it. While the ICC has yet to litigate the concept of aiding and abetting, it appears that this version may allow for a more minimal actus reus but require a higher mens rea than at the ad hoc tribunals. On the other hand, Article 25(3) further contains section (d) which, while not called 'aiding and abetting', might capture conduct (particularly in its subsection (ii)) that would fall under aiding and abetting liability at the ad hoc tribunals:

> (d) In any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose. Such contribution shall be intentional and shall either:
>
> (i) Be made with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group, where such activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; or
>
> (ii) Be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime.

These questions await the further elucidation by future decisions of the ICC.

Cases

Federal Republic of Germany, S. and others (Hechingen and Haigerloch Deportation case), Tribunal (Landgericht) Hechingen, Judgment of 18 June 1947[1]

Five accused in this case were charged with assisting the Gestapo with the deportation of Jews from two towns in Germany, Hechingen and Haigerloch, to concentration camps in 1941–42. One of the accused was acquitted while four were convicted. None of these four accused devised or ordered the deportations. The principal accused was S., who was a senior administrative and police official who transmitted orders that he received from the Gestapo on to those responsible in the villages, while the other three – H., Ho. and K – were women who held no official positions but who were required to search the deportees to determine if they were holding any valuables. The first excerpt is from the trial judgment. The second excerpt is from the Court of Appeal which reversed the convictions of the three women and granted a new trial to S. In the second trial, S. was acquitted.

[1] English translation in (2009) 7 JICJ 131.

3047

S874

[. . .] On the basis of the trial and the hearing of the evidence, the following is established:

(1) The accused S., as then Landrat ['county president', senior administrative and police official of a County] of Hechingen, received the order of 14 August 1942 of the Stuttgart Head Office of the Gestapo [abbreviation of Geheime Staatspolizei, Secret State Police – the German text uses the full form throughout]. On 17 August 1942, he gave the mayors of Haigerloch and Hechingen the necessary instructions in writing for carrying out this order, in particular to have the Jews directed to 'deportation' and their luggage searched in the prescribed manner, and to ready these persons for transport on 19 August 1942. He further instructed persons officially subordinate to him to cooperate in the physical search of the persons to be deported; he gave this instruction to, among others, co-defendant Ms Ho., who carried it out on 19 August 1942 together with Mrs M., appointed for the purpose by the mayor of Haigerloch, in relation to the Jewish women concerned. These findings are based, to the extent that they relate to the accused Mr S., on his own statements; otherwise they result from the statements of co-defendant Ms Ho. The detail of how the physical search of the Jewish women by Ms Ho. occurred will be presented below in another context.

(b) A total of 138 people, 136 from Haigerloch and 2 from Hechingen, were affected by this fourth deportation. These 138 people were transported under police escort on 19 August 1942 from Haigerloch to Stuttgart, nine of the particularly infirm in road vehicles, the rest by rail. In Stuttgart they were brought to the Gestapo collecting point, and from there transported to Theresienstadt. Of the 138 people deported, only a single victim remained alive and returned to Haigerloch; all the others, it must be regarded as certain, either died or were killed during the deportation. Information on the circumstances in Theresienstadt has been provided by the testimony of Senior State Attorney Mr D. of Stuttgart. [. . .]

(2) The accused S., by executing himself in part the orders that reached him from the Gestapo and in part having them executed by people under him, participated in persecution on racial grounds and thus in a crime against humanity.

(a) Accused S. objectively, to be sure, acted neither as perpetrator (Täter) nor co-perpetrator (Mittäter) but as accessory (Gehilfe), since his participation was confined to executing the orders of the Gestapo in his capacity as Landrat of Kreis Hechingen, to the detriment of the Jews concerned, without departing from these orders on the basis of decisions of his own.

The consideration that the Gestapo orders would have been executed even if accused S. had not been involved in their execution, that is, the consideration that his participation was not causal for their success, does not exonerate the accused. The causality concept (Ursachenbegriff) in legal science is not – unlike that in natural science – mechanistically oriented, but teleologically, in the sense of the purpose of the legal system. Accordingly, no accessory can escape penal responsibility by showing that the main perpetrator (Haupttäter) could have carried out the act even without his assistance. In the great mechanism of the persecution of the Jews, every single cog was interchangeable at all times. Were one, given that fact, to seek to exclude the criminal responsibility of each interchangeable participant because of the absence of causality of his participation, then ultimately only the main perpetrators would be liable; all accessories would get off scot-free, even if they had acted on racial grounds, for even in the latter case their participation would, on a mechanistic view, not have been causal.

The accused S. has further appealed to the fact that it could not be within the intention of Control Council Law No. 10 to punish absolutely all participation in the carrying out of persecution of the Jews; for instance, a typist typing out the Gestapo deportation orders and posting them, or the driver of a locomotive pulling the train the deported Jews were to be transported by, could not be punishable. This consideration is just as wrong as the previous one, though in the opposite direction; while the previous consideration couched the concept of causality too narrowly, it is now too broad. From the impunity of participation by a typist or train driver, the impunity of the Landrat's participation does not follow; to that extent, his argument does not prove what it is supposed to prove. The range of duties (Pflichtenkreis) of a typist or train driver is quite different from a Landrat's. A typist's official duty is fulfilled in her accurately and punctually typing what she is asked to; a train driver's in bringing the rail transport punctually and safely to its destination; neither the one nor the other commits a breach of duty if their activity happened to be part of the persecution of the Jews. Things are quite different with a Landrat. As the senior administrative and police official of the Kreis, he is entrusted with the administrative and police protection of its population against unlawful interference with their liberty and property; he infringes his set of duties if he participates in interference with the very legal goods he is called on to protect.

3048

5875

(b) In subjective respects, the punishability of accused S. depends on his having acted intentionally as an accessory. Intent as an accessory (Gehilfenvorsatz) requires, first, that the accused knew what act he was furthering by his participation; he must have been aware that the actions ordered from him by the Gestapo served persecution on racial grounds. He had this awareness, as the Court hereby finds, as the outcome of the trial and taking of evidence, on the basis of the wording and content of the Gestapo orders he received, even if, as he has credibly assured, he did not reckon on the possibility that the deported Jews might be killed. The accused may also be believed to have assumed that the forced deportation of the Jews was in the interest of the defence of the Reich, and that he formed a too favourable conception of the fate awaiting the Jews after deportation ('resettlement') and was strengthened therein by hopes expressed by some of the Jews concerned themselves. The fact nonetheless remains that the forced deportation of the Jews as such, taken together with the confiscation and seizure of their assets, was seen by the accused as 'persecution on racial grounds'. The accused himself stated at the trial that he regarded the Gestapo measures as 'unjust' to the Jews, and struggled with himself whether to carry out the measures or not; these statements by the accused himself enable and support the finding made above.

Intent as an accessory (Gehilfenvorsatz) requires, second, that the accused knew that through his participation he was furthering the principal act. He had this awareness too, as the Court hereby finds, as an outcome of the trial and taking of evidence. This awareness is not excluded by the consideration brought up by the accused that if he himself had refused to execute the Gestapo measures someone else would have carried them out in his place, but on the contrary shown to be present; for this consideration shows that the accused took it upon himself, for reasons the scope of which is still to be discussed, to carry out the Gestapo orders himself instead of leaving it to someone else.

Intent as an accessory does not, by contrast, require the accused himself to have acted from racial considerations or from inhumane attitudes at all. Nor is it required that the accused had an awareness of the illegality of his action, since Control Council Law No. 10 declares persecution on racial grounds punishable irrespective of whether it infringes the national law of the country in which it was committed; it is thus immaterial what notion the person had as to the legality of his actions. That, finally, the fact that the accused was acting on orders does not exclude penal responsibility as an accessory is explicitly stated in Article II(4)(b) of Control Council Law No. 10.

(3) It remains to be discussed whether accused S. can appeal to grounds excluding guilt or punishment.

(a) Accused S. has asserted that he weighed against each other the facts that he could not prevent the carrying out of the Gestapo measures; that these measures would be carried out all the same even if he refused to do so; that his participation in these measures would accordingly not spare any of the Jews concerned the evils threatening them; and on the other hand facts that his participation in these measures enabled him to remain in his post as Landrat [illegible]

3049

5876

s remaining in office was both in the interest of the Jewish population to the extent that he ould mitigate some things, and in the interest of the non-Jewish part of the population with negative attitude to National Socialism, in so far as he could uphold or procure facilitations or this part of the Kreis population too; from this weighing up, he had arrived at the conclu- on that preponderant interests justified his carrying out, in order to remain in office, the orders of the Gestapo; he was strengthened in this view by the fact that his remaining in office was desired both on the Jewish side and by respectable figures in the non-Jewish part of the Kreis population, and even explicitly asked for: if in this weighing up he had based himself on inaccurate expectations or if the weighing up as such was incorrect, this was at most a politi- al error, not a criminal fault.

That accused S., and with him the circles supporting him in his resolution, were making a severe political mistake in this consideration, even if the premises of the weighing up be sup- posed to be correct, is plain. During the rule of National Socialism, the temptation was – it may be admitted – indeed great to come to terms with the unbearable, whether out of fear of worse yet to come or in the hope of being able to maintain for oneself and others a 'party-free' reservation – however small. This fear and this hope, both of these elements in the think- ing of accused S., were very well recognized by National Socialism, which used them and abused them as a psychological and political factor. Inside the official apparatus, in general only the key positions were occupied by ideologically committed and reliable party comrades. That was quite enough. The rest of the officials could be left with the illusion of freedom in little things, indeed even a certain actual freedom; that was a cheap price to pay for their com- pliance in all important matters, and they were willing to pay it for they knew very well that all those who – like accused S. – pursued opportunist policies in order to maintain their freedom of action ultimately became prisoners of their own policies.

Thus it could not fail to happen, and, as this case showed actually did happen, that part of the civil service bowed to immoral and illegal impositions; what began as a political error ended as moral and criminal guilt. When politics comes into conflict with law and morality, this conflict can be solved only in the sense that law and morality must never be adjusted to politics, but politics must always be to law and morality. This principle applies to the State as a whole; it applies to every official as an individual. Each citizen has a right to have an official, from whom an immoral and illegal action is demanded, refrain from that action; each citizen must be protected against officials, irrespective of the considerations they base themselves on, committing such acts. An official who fails to see this is acting not simply unwisely politically because he is undermining trust in the lawfulness of the administration, but at the same time unlawfully. That is why accused S. must be refused the appeal to the balancing of interests he did; an error as to the admissibility of this balancing of interests counts against him. [...]

(2) The accused Ho., K. and B., by undertaking the search of the Jewish women for deport- ation, objectively took part, specifically as accessories (Gehilfen), in a persecution on racial grounds and thus in a crime against humanity within the meaning of Article II(1)(c), (2)(b) and (3) of Control Council Law No. 10. Their involvement was admittedly, considered in the con- text of the whole, only of a subordinate nature, and the three accused did not, by contrast with co-defendant S., infringe any special set of duties. What nonetheless makes their involve- ment punishable is the fact that the body search taken together with the removal of the valu- ables found thereby was particularly degrading for the Jewish women affected. In subjective respects, the punishability of the three accused depends on whether they deliberately (vorsät- zlich) acted as accessories (Gehilfen). This condition is met for all three of these accused. The accused recognized (accused K. and B. at the latest by the time they were at the station in Haigerloch and accused Ho. earlier, when she received the order given to her) that they were being called on to take part in a persecution on racial grounds; this finding is hereby made on the basis of the oral proceedings. That these three accused did not know the contents of the Gestapo decrees and could not therefore fully perceive what measures of persecution the Jews would individually be exposed to is irrelevant; what they did know, namely that Jews were being forcibly deported and in this connection searched and made to hand over jewelry, suffices to establish intention in their cases. This knowledge (Wissen) was also inevitably associated with the insight that through their actions the accused were furthering the principal offence. Intentionality as accessory (Gehilfenvorsatz) did not require that the accused acted from racial motives and further did not require that they had an awareness of the illegality (Bewusstsein der Rechtswidrigkeit) of their actions, as has already been explained in the judgment on accused S. It is similarly irrelevant that if an individual accused or all the accused had refused their participation, the search would still have been carried out by the remaining accused, or by other persons.

3050

S8-77

Federal Republic of Germany*, S. and others (Hechimgen and Haigerloch Deportation case), Court of Appeal (Oberlandesgericht) *Tübingen, Judgment of 20 January 1948

The Court of Appeal found that the Trial Court made inadequate findings with respect to the letter ordering S. to facilitate and implement the deportation, and therefore it ordered that S. be granted a new trial. It addressed therefore the scope of accessory liability, and in particular the required mens rea, in the context of the case against the three women.

Persecution on political, racial and religious grounds is listed in Article II(1)(c) of the Law as the last explanatory example of a crime against humanity. This crime too must accordingly be carried out inhumanely. The perpetrator must have acted out of an inhumane mindset, derived from a politically, racially or religiously determined ideology [. . .]

[Control Council] Law No. 10, in Article II(2)(a)–(e), equates all conceivable forms of commission or participation. It does not distinguish between perpetration (Täterschaft) and participation (Teilnahme). The accessory (Gehilfe) to a crime against humanity is 'regarded as guilty of a crime against humanity, without regard to the capacity in which he acted' (Clause 2 of the Introductory Act). From this complete equation with the perpetrator it follows that the accessory must have acted from the same mindset as the perpetrator himself, that is, from an inhumane mindset and in persecutions under politically, racially or religiously determined ideologies. The Criminal Division rightly took it that as regards the punishability of participation, Law No. 10 is of plain interpretation.

The trial court plainly struggles with the limits of accessory liability. While it eloquently articulates why 'cogs' in the machine of mass crime must be held to account, it also recognizes the potential breadth of this approach and seeks to find a line between the 'typist' and the 'senior administrative and police official' who both assist in the execution of a criminal scheme. With respect to S., the court seizes on the question of 'duty', finding that S.'s transmission of Gestapo orders amounted to accessory liability because he had a duty to protect the people of his village. This distinction falls away, however, when it comes to the responsibility of the three women who had no duty. Nonetheless the trial court finds that they are different from the 'typist', it seems, because of their physical and proximate (and degrading) participation in the deportation itself. For the Court of Appeal, though the line was elsewhere; only those who assisted the crime and shared the intent of the main perpetrators could be held liable. This question of where to draw the line of liability is a central theme in the ongoing debates on aiding and abetting.

3051

S178

US Military Tribunal Sitting in Nuremberg, US v. Ernst von Weizsäcker et al., (Ministries case), Judgment of 11–13 April 1949

This case is primarily known for its holding on the crime of aggression, and is excerpted in the chapter (Part I(4)) dealing with aggression, but in addition all but 2 of the 21 defendants were convicted of war crimes and crimes against humanity. The following excerpt pertains to the responsibility of two officials in the German Foreign Office for the deportation of 6,000 Jews from France in March 1942: Ernst von Weizsaecker, the State Secretary of the Foreign Office, and Ernst Woermann, the Ministerial Director and Chief of the Political Division of the German Foreign Office. Both Accused were sentenced to a term of imprisonment of seven years.

On 9 March 1942 [Adolf] Eichmann of the SS wrote [to] the Foreign Office [saying] that it was intended to deport to Auschwitz 1,000 French and stateless Jews who had been arrested in France in 1941, asking if there was any objection.

On 11 March the SS again wrote [to] the Foreign Office [saying] that it was desired to include 5,000 more Jews from France. On the same day [Hans] Luther [Under Secretary in charge of Deutschland] wired the German Embassy in Paris, forwarding the request and asking for comment, and Paris replied, "No objection."

On 20 March [Franz] Rademacher [subordinate to Luther], by order, informed the SS that the Foreign Office had no objections to these 6,000 Jews being deported. This was initialed by Woermann and von Weizsaecker, and contains the latter's comment, "to be selected by the police."

There remains no shadow of doubt that both Woermann and von Weizsaecker were informed of this nefarious plan and that it received their official approval. There is nothing in the record to show that they questioned its propriety, objected to or protested against it, or availed themselves of the opportunity to suggest to von Ribbentrop that even from the viewpoint of German foreign policy its execution would be a catastrophic mistake in that it would not only alienate public sentiment in France, but would arouse a wave of horror and resentment throughout the world. Neither claims that there was any legal justification for this deportation or suggests it was other than a flagrant violation of international law and of the provisions of the Hague Convention.

Woermann's excuse is that he was not able to do anything and that his cosignature meant that he saw no valid political reason which could be urged against it and that the reason that the Foreign Office communication was signed by the State Secretary and by two other state secretaries, including himself, was that it was an important matter.

However, his own witness, Lehmann, an old civil servant in the Foreign Office, called as an expert on Foreign Office practice, does not bear him out. He testified, somewhat reluctantly, that when a Foreign Office official initialed a draft he thereby outwardly approved it, even though he may have had mental reservations as to its propriety.

The defendant Woermann knew that there were cogent reasons of a political nature why the measure should be disapproved; he knew that it was in violation of every principle of international law and in direct contradiction of the Hague Convention.

Von Weizsaecker asserts that this occurred at a time of repeated attempted attacks on members of the Wehrmacht and Hitler had ordered frequent shootings of hostages in France; that these Jews were already interned and were in danger, and one could very easily come to the conclusion that the deportations to the East might involve less danger to them than remaining where they were; that the name Auschwitz did not mean anything to anybody at that time. He does not state that this was, in fact, his reason for not objecting, but that it was probably his reason. He further asserts that the Foreign Office did not instigate or execute these measures and its point of view or opinion could not prevent them. The latter contention, however, is hardly tenable, in view of the fact that Eichmann of the SS made specific inquiries as to whether the Foreign Office had objections.

S679

While we are ready and anxious to accord to every defendant the benefit of any reasonable doubt to which he may be entitled, it is difficult to find any such doubt here, even though we assume that neither defendant, at that time, had knowledge that Auschwitz was a death camp. Nevertheless they knew and were well informed of the fate of any Jew who came into the tender hands of the SS and Gestapo; they knew what had been the fate of the Jews of Poland, the Baltic states, and Russia; they knew what had been the horrible fate of German Jews.

While admitting that many things passed over his desk and received his initials of approval as to which he harbored mental reservations and objections, he states he remained in office for two reasons: first, that he might thereby continue to be at least a cohesive factor in the underground opposition to Hitler by occupying an important listening post, maintaining members of the opposition in strategic positions, distributing information between opposition groups in the Wehrmacht, the various governmental departments, and in civil life; and second, that he might be in a position to initiate or aid in attempts to negotiate peace. We believe him, but this, while it may and should be considered in mitigation, cannot constitute a defense to charges of war crimes or crimes against humanity. One cannot give consent to or implement the commission of murder because by so doing he hopes eventually to be able to rid society of the chief murderer. The first is a crime of imminent actuality while the second is but a future hope.

When the SS inquired whether the Foreign Office had any objections, it was the defendant's duty to point them out. That is the function of a political department and a state secretary of a foreign office. It is not performed by saying or doing nothing. Even the defendant's witness von Schlabrendorff, himself an active leader in the resistance movement, and a participant in the plot of 20 July 1944, testified that being a member of that movement did not justify one in becoming a party to the program of the murder of Jews. As to these and like instances, we find the defendants von Weizsaecker and Woermann guilty.

COMMENTARY

The court here finds that Woermann and von Weizsaecker had a legal and political duty to object to the deportation plan and that their failure to object, even if they were not aware of the ultimate fate of the deportees and did not instigate the plan or share its aims, amounted to aiding and abetting the crime of deportation. Although the accused in fact approved the plan, the court suggests that the result would have been the same had they simply done nothing in the face of the deportation proposal. The court, therefore, seems to embrace the notion of aiding and abetting through omission whereby an individual becomes liable if he fails to fulfil a duty that is his, acts with the requisite intent (either knowledge that his failure allows for the crime to occur or for the purpose of furthering the crime), and thereby allows for, or contributes to, the commission of a crime. The court's analysis – and the fact that it was carried out by US Judges – raises interesting questions about contemporary debates (for example in the United States) concerning the responsibility of government officials, and in particular legal advisers, to act affirmatively to stop the conduct of government actors that might amount to international crimes.

The court in the Ministries case was arguably not completely consistent, however, in its application of the notion of aiding and abetting. Another defendant was Karl Rasch, a member and later speaker of the Vorstand (management board) of the Dresdner bank issue was whether he could be held criminally liable for approving loans that he knew ould be used by the SS to finance enterprises that used slave labour:

3053

S880

Rasche's] participation in the loans made by the Dresdner Bank to various SS enterprises which ployed slave labor and to those engaged in the resettlement program presents a more difficult roblem.

The defendant is a banker and businessman of long experience and is possessed of a keen nd active mind. Bankers do not approve or make loans in the number and amount made by the Dresdner Bank without ascertaining, having, or obtaining information or knowledge as to the purpose for which the loan is sought, and how it is to be used. It is inconceivable to us that the defendant did not possess that knowledge, and we find that he did.

The real question is, is it a crime to make a loan, knowing or having good reason to believe that the borrower will us[e] the funds in financing enterprises which are employed in using labor in violation of either national or international law? Does he stand in any different position than one who sells supplies or raw materials to a builder building a house, knowing that the structure will be used for an unlawful purpose? A bank sells money or credit in the same manner as the merchandiser of any other commodity. It does not become a partner in enterprise, and the interest charged is merely the gross profit which the bank realizes from the transaction, out of which it must deduct its business costs, and from which it hopes to realize a net profit. Loans or sale of commodities to be used in an unlawful enterprise may well be condemned from a moral standpoint and reflect no credit on the part of the lender or seller in either case, but the transaction can hardly be said to be a crime. Our duty is to try and punish those guilty of violating international law, and we are not prepared to state that such loans constitute a violation of that law, nor has our attention been drawn to any ruling to the contrary.

The defendant Rasche should be and is found not guilty under count five.

Although the court's approach seems different with respect to Rasche as compared to von Weizsaecker and Woermann, perhaps the distinction is that Rasche, acting in his capacity as a banker, owed no duty to any person to ensure that the funds he was responsible for loaning were not being used for any criminal purpose.

A French court had, however, a different approach in the Röchling case, in which five German industrialists were tried for their role in aggressive war, war crimes and crimes against humanity. It found the accused Hans Lothar von Gemmingen-Hornberg, the President of the Board of Directors of the Röchling steel plants and a plant manager, guilty of inhuman treatment because of the horrific conditions faced by the foreign workers and prisoners of war forced to work in the plants. The court found that although the Gestapo was principally responsible for the conditions and treatment of the workers, von Gemmingen-Hornberg's high position in the corporation and his close relationship to Röchling himself (von Gemmingen-Hornberg was Röchling's son-in-law) gave the accused 'sufficient authority to obtain an alleviation in the treatment of these workers'. The court concluded that there is 'cause under these circumstances to hold von Gemmingen-Hornberg responsible for the inhuman treatment of the foreign workers and prisoners of war in the firm of Röchling, which he aided by his negligence and his lack of courage towards the Gestapo'.[2]

Therefore, while the World War II courts embraced the concept of aiding and abetting liability (while not always identifying it in those terms), they did not necessarily reach a uniform definition of the concept. The modern tribunals took further steps to define the notion as demonstrated in the following excerpt.

[redacted]

[2] General Tribunal at Rastadt of the Military Government for the French Zone of Occupation of Germany, 16 June 1948, English summary in Annual Digest 1948, 398–404.

3054

S681

ICTY*, Prosecutor v. Furundžija, *Trial Chamber, Judgment of 10 December 1998

Anto Furundžija was the commander of a special unit, known at the 'Jokers', of the Bosnian-Croat army (the HVO). He was tried and convicted of the war crimes of torture and outrages on personal dignity, including rape. Specifically, Furundžija was accused of interrogating a Muslim woman while a fellow officer first rubbed his knife all over her body and thigh, threatening to cut out her private parts if she did not cooperate, and then raped her. Furundžija was convicted of being a co-perpetrator of torture and aiding and abetting outrages on personal dignity and sentenced to 10 years. The excerpt below is from the trial judgment.

D. Aiding and Abetting

1. Introduction

190. The accused is charged with torture and outrages upon personal dignity, including rape. For the purposes of the present case however, it is necessary to define "aiding and abetting" as used in Article 7(1) of the Statute.

191. Since no treaty law on the subject exists, the Trial Chamber must examine customary international law in order to establish the content of this head of criminal responsibility. In particular, it must establish both whether the accused's alleged presence in the locations where Witness A was assaulted would be sufficient to constitute the actus reus of aiding and abetting, and also the relevant mens rea required to accompany this action for responsibility to ensue.

2. Actus Reus

192. With regard to the actus reus, the Trial Chamber must examine whether the assistance given by the aider and abettor need be tangible in nature or may consist only of encouragement or moral support. The Trial Chamber must also examine the proximity required between the assistance provided and the commission of the criminal act. In particular, it will have to consider whether the actions of the aider and abettor need to have a causal effect, so that without his contribution the offence would not be committed, or whether the acts of the aider and abettor need simply facilitate the commission of the offence in some way.

(a) International Case Law

(i) Introduction

193. Little light is shed on the definition of aiding and abetting by the international instruments providing for major war trials: the London Agreement, the Charter of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East, establishing the Tokyo Tribunal, and Control Council Law No. 10. It therefore becomes necessary to examine the case law.

194. For a correct appraisal of this case law, it is important to bear in mind, with each of the cases to be examined, the forum in which the case was heard, as well as the law applied as these factors determine its authoritative value. In addition, one should constantly be mindful of the need for great caution in using national case law for the purpose of determining whether customary rules of international criminal law have evolved in a particular matter.

195. First of all, there are the cases stemming from US military commissions or, in territories occupied by US forces, by courts and tribunals set up by the military government. While

3055

5782

...tary commissions operated under different directives within each theatre of US military ...rations, each applied a provision identical to that of the London Agreement with relation ...complicity. In occupied territories, the courts and tribunals operated under the terms of ...ntrol Council Law No. 10.

...5. The Trial Chamber will also rely on case law from the British military courts for the trials ...f war criminals, whose jurisdiction was based on the Royal Warrant of 14 June 1945, which ...rovided that the rules of procedure to be applied were those of domestic military courts, ...nless otherwise specified. In fact, unless otherwise provided, the law applied was domestic, ...hus rendering the pronouncements of the British courts less helpful in establishing rules of ...nternational law on this issue. However, there is sufficient similarity between the law applied ...n the British cases and under Control Council Law No. 10 for these cases to merit considera...tion. The British cases deal with forms of complicity analogous to that alleged in the present ...ase. The term used to describe those liable as accomplices (in killing) is that they were "con...cerned in the killing".

197. Cases heard under Control Council Law No. 10, either by the German Supreme Court in the British Occupied Zone, or by German courts in the French Occupied Zone are also material to the Trial Chamber's analysis.

198. Finally, the International Tribunal has on a previous occasion examined the question of complicity under its Statute, namely in the Opinion and Judgment of 7 May 1997 in the case of Prosecutor v. Duško Tadić, hereafter "Tadić Judgement".

(ii) Nature of Assistance

199. The Trial Chamber will first examine the nature of the assistance required to establish actus reus. The cases which follow indicate that in certain circumstances, aiding and abetting need not be tangible, but may consist of moral support or encouragement of the principals in their commission of the crime.

200. In the British case of Schonfeld, four of the ten accused were found guilty of being "concerned in the killing of" three Allied airmen, who had been found hiding in the home of a member of the Dutch resistance. All four claimed that their purpose in visiting the scene had been the investigation and arrest of the Allied airmen. One admitted to shooting the three airmen but claimed it was in self-defence; he was found guilty and sentenced to death. The roles of the three others were less direct. One drove a car to the scene and was the first to enter the house. Another had obtained the original information, searched a different house for the airmen earlier and claimed to have stood guard at the back entrance to the house along with the fourth convicted person. All except one denied having fired any shots themselves.

201. The court did not make clear the grounds on which it found these three to have been "concerned in the killing". However, the Advocate General, citing the position in English law, outlined the role of an accessory who is not present at the scene but procures, counsels, commands or abets another to commit the offence, and that of an aider and abettor, either of which could have formed the basis of the court's decision. In doing so he gave an example of how an individual may participate without giving tangible assistance:

> if he watched for his companions in order to prevent surprise, or remained at a convenient distance in order to favour their escape, if necessary, or was in such a situation as to be able readily to come to their assistance, the knowledge of which was calculated to give additional confidence to his companions, he was, in contemplation of law, present, aiding and abetting.

202. Again, in giving "additional confidence to his companions" the defendant facilitates the commission of the crime, and it is this which constitutes the actus reus of the offence.

3056

203. In the British case of Rohde six persons were found guilty of being "concerned in the killing" of four British women prisoners in German hands. The women were executed by lethal injection and their bodies disposed of in the prison camp crematorium. In defining the term "concerned in the killing", the Judge Advocate explained that actual presence at the crime scene was not necessary to be "concerned in the killing". He gave the example of a lookout who would be "concerned in the killing" by providing a service to the commission of the crime in the knowledge that the crime was going to be committed.

204. In the case of one of the accused, assistance ex post facto was found to be sufficient for criminal responsibility. As this was not the position under English law, the inference is warranted that the court applied a different law to these international crimes. The service provided by the cremator may be analogous to that of the lookout, in that the knowledge that the bodies will be disposed of, in the same way that the knowledge that they will be warned of impending discovery in the lookout scenario, reassures the killers and facilitates their commission of the crime in some significant way.

205. Guidance can also be derived from the following cases, which were heard under the terms of Control Council Law No. 10. In the Synagogue case, decided by the German Supreme Court in the British Occupied Zone, one of the accused was found guilty of a crime against humanity (the devastation of a synagogue) although he had not physically taken part in it, but planned or ordered it. His intermittent presence on the crime-scene, combined with his status as an "alter Kämpfer" (long-time militant of the Nazi party) and his knowledge of the criminal enterprise, were deemed sufficient to convict him.

206. The accused was convicted at first instance of a crime against humanity under the provision on co-perpetration of a crime ("Mittäterschaft") of the then German penal code (Art. 47 Strafgesetzbuch). The conviction was confirmed on appeal. The appellate decision noted that the accused was a militant Nazi. The court went on to find that he knew of the plan at least two hours before the commission of the crime.

207. It may be inferred from this case that an approving spectator who is held in such regard by the other perpetrators that his presence encourages them in their conduct, may be guilty of complicity in a crime against humanity.

208. The Synagogue case may be contrasted with the Pig-cart parade case, also from the German Supreme Court in the British Occupied Zone. The accused, P had attended, as a spectator in civilian dress, a SA (Stürmabteilung) "parade" in which two political opponents of the NSDAP (Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei) were exposed to public humiliation. P had followed the "parade" without taking any active part. The court found that P, > followed the parade only as a spectator in civilian clothes, although he was following a service order by the SA for a purpose yet unknown... His conduct cannot even with certainty be evaluated as objective or subjective approval. Furthermore, silent approval that does not contribute to causing the offence in no way meets the requirements for criminal liability.

P was found not guilty. He may have lacked the necessary mens rea. But in any event, his insignificant status brought the effect of his "silent approval" below the threshold necessary for the actus reus.

209. It appears from the Synagogue and Pig-cart parade cases that presence, when combined with authority, can constitute assistance in the form of moral support, that is, the actus reus of the offence. The supporter must be of a certain status for this to be sufficient for criminal responsibility. This emphasis on the accused's authority was also affirmed in Akayesu. Jean Paul Akayesu was the bourgmestre, or mayor, of the Commune in which atrocities, including rape and sexual violence, occurred. That Trial Chamber considered this position of authority highly significant for his criminal liability for aiding and abetting: "The Tribunal finds

5784

...le 6(1) of its Statute, that the Accused, having had reason to know that sexual violence ...s occurring, aided and abetted the following acts of sexual violence, by allowing them to ...e place on or near the premises of the bureau communal and by facilitating the commission ...ch sexual violence through his words of encouragement in other acts of sexual violence ...ich, by virtue of his authority, sent a clear signal of official tolerance for sexual violence, ...thout which these acts would not have taken place: [...]". Furthermore, it can be inferred ...m this finding that assistance need not be tangible. In addition, assistance need not consti... an indispensable element, that is, a conditio sine qua non for the acts of the principal.

...0. Mention should also be made of several cases which enable us to distinguish aiding and ...etting from the case of co-perpetration involving a group of persons pursuing a common ...esign to commit crimes.

...1. The Dachau Concentration Camp case was held before a US Tribunal under Control ...ouncil Law No. 10. All the accused held some position in the hierarchy running the Dachau ...ncentration camp. While allegations of direct participation in instances of ill-treatment were ...ade against certain accused, and allegations of command responsibility against others, ...e real basis of the charges was that all the accused had "acted in pursuance of a common ...esign" to kill and mistreat prisoners, and hence to commit war crimes.

...2. The organised and official nature of the system by which war crimes were perpetrated ...n this case adds a specific element to the "complicity" of the accused. The report of the case ...y the United Nations War Crimes Commission isolates three elements necessary to establish ...uilt in each case. The first was the existence of a system to ill- treat the prisoners and commit ...e various crimes alleged; the second was the accused's knowledge of the nature of this sys... and the third was that the accused "encouraged, aided and abetted or participated" in ...forcing the system. Once the existence of the system had been established, a given accused ...as potentially liable for his participation in this system. The roles of the accused ranged from ...amp commanders to guards and prisoner functionaries and all were found guilty, with the ...fference in the levels of participation reflected in the sentences. It would seem that the hold... of any role in the administration of the camps was sufficient to constitute encouraging, ...ding and abetting or participating in the enforcement of the system.

...3. The prosecution in the Dachau Concentration Camp case, did not base its case on the ...ect participation of the accused in the crime. Regardless of whether the accused themselves ...d beaten or murdered the concentration camp inmates, the assistance they afforded to ...ose who did, or the system, formed the basis of their guilt. The level of assistance required ...as low: any participation in the enterprise was sufficient, although as the accused were all ...embers of staff of the camps, their contribution to the commission of the crimes was tan... – the carrying out of their respective duties – so that none were convicted on the basis ...f having lent moral support or encouragement alone. [...]

(iii) Effect of Assistance on the Act of the Principal

...7. Back to aiding and abetting, in the Einsatzgruppen case, heard by a US Military Tribunal ...ting at Nuremberg, all of the accused except for one (Graf) were officers charged with war ...mes and crimes against humanity pursuant to Control Council Law No. 10. The Tribunal held ...at the acts of the accomplices had to have a substantial effect on those of the principals to ...onstitute the actus reus of the war crimes and crimes against humanity charged. This conclu...on is illustrated by the cases of four of the accused: Klingelhoefer, Fendler, Ruehl and Graf. ...lingelhoefer held a variety of positions, the least important of which was that of interpreter. ...he court said that even if this were his only function,

> ...would not exonerate him from guilt because in locating, evaluating and turning over lists ...of Communist party functionaries to the executive of his organisation he was aware that ...the people listed would be executed when found.

3058

S885

218. Fendler served in one of the Kommandos of the Einsatzgruppen for a period of seven months. The prosecution case against him was not that he himself conducted an execution but rather "that he was part of an organisation committed to an extermination programme". The Court noted that:

> The defendant knew that executions were taking place. He admitted that the procedure which determined the so-called guilt of a person which resulted in him being condemned to death was "too summary". But, there is no evidence that he ever did anything about it. As the second highest ranking officer in the Kommando, his views could have been heard in complaint or protest against what he now says was a too summary procedure, but he chose to let the injustice go uncorrected.

Both of these defendants were found guilty.

219. The cases of Ruehl and Graf provide a contrast which helps delineate the actus reus of the offence. The Tribunal held that both had the requisite knowledge of the criminal activities of the organisations of which they were a part. Ruehl's position, however, was not such as to "control, prevent, or modify" those activities. His low rank failed to "place him automatically into a position where his lack of objection in any way contributed to the success of any executive operation". He was found not guilty.

220. Graf was a non-commissioned officer. The court held that:

> Since there is no evidence in the record that Graf was at any time in a position to protest against the illegal actions of the others, he cannot be found guilty as an accessory under counts one and two [war crimes and crimes against humanity] of the indictment.

221. It is clear, then, that knowledge of the criminal activities of the organisation combined with a role in that organisation was not sufficient for complicity in this case and that the defendants' acts in carrying out their duties had to have a substantial effect on the commission of the offence for responsibility to ensue. This might be because their failure to protest made some difference to the course of events, or, in the case of Klingelhoefer, that his transmission of the lists of names led directly to the execution of the members of those lists.

222. In the British case of Zyklon B, the three accused were charged with supplying poison gas used for the extermination of allied nationals interned in concentration camps, in the knowledge that the gas was to be so used. The owner and second-in-command of the firm were found guilty; Drosihn, the firm's first gassing technician, was acquitted. The Judge Advocate set out the issue of Drosihn's complicity as turning on, > whether there was any evidence that he was in a position either to influence the transfer of gas to Auschwitz or to prevent it. If he were not in such a position, no knowledge of the use to which the gas was put could make him guilty.

223. This clearly requires that the act of the accomplice has at least a substantial effect on the principal act – the use of the gas to murder internees at Auschwitz – in order to constitute the actus reus. The functions performed by Drosihn in his employment as a gassing technician were an integral part of the supply and use of the poison gas, but this alone could not render him liable for its criminal use even if he was aware that his functions played such an important role in the transfer of gas. Without influence over this supply, he was not guilty. In other words, mens rea alone is insufficient to ground a criminal conviction.

224. In S. et al., hereafter "Hechingen Deportation", heard by a German court in the French occupied zone, five accused were charged with complicity in the mass deportation of Jews in 1941 and 1942 as a crime against humanity under Control Council Law No. 10. The accused S, was the local administrative authority responsible for organising the execution of German orders. He had complied with a Gestapo decree concerning the deportations. The first instance found S guilty of aiding and abetting the Gestapo in its criminal activity. His objection that his conduct in no way contributed to the crimes, because others would have taken his place if he had refused to comply with the Gestapo decree, was dismissed. The court pointed out that the culpability of an aider and abettor is not negated by the fact that his assistance could easily have been obtained from another. [...]

3259

5886

The court reviewed relevant 'international instruments' and found that both the 1996 Draft Cod[e] of Crimes against Peace and Security of Mankind, drafted by the International Law Commission, and the Rome Statute supported the notion that aiding and abetting could include either physical or moral support and that the assistance need only be substantial or facilitating but not necessary or essential.

(c) Conclusion

232. On the issue of the nature of assistance rendered, the German cases suggest that the assistance given by an accomplice need not be tangible and can consist of moral support in certain circumstances. While any spectator can be said to be encouraging a spectacle – an audience being a necessary element of a spectacle – the spectator in these cases was only found to be complicit if his status was such that his presence had a significant legitimising or encouraging effect on the principals. This is supported by the provisions of the International Law Commission Draft Code. In view of this, the Trial Chamber believes the use of the term "direct" in qualifying the proximity of the assistance and the principal act to be misleading as it may imply that assistance needs to be tangible, or to have a causal effect on the crime. This may explain why the word "direct" was not used in the Rome Statute's provision on aiding and abetting.

233. On the effect of the assistance given to the principal, none of the cases above suggests that the acts of the accomplice need bear a causal relationship to, or be a conditio sine qua non for, those of the principal. The suggestion made in the Einsatzgruppen and Zyklon B cases is that the relationship between the acts of the accomplice and of the principal must be such that the acts of the accomplice make a significant difference to the commission of the criminal act by the principal. Having a role in a system without influence would not be enough to attract criminal responsibility, as demonstrated by the case of the defendant Ruehl in the Einsatzgruppen case. This interpretation is supported by the German cases cited.

234. The position under customary international law seems therefore to be best reflected in the proposition that the assistance must have a substantial effect on the commission of the crime. This is the position adopted by the Trial Chamber.

235. In sum, the Trial Chamber holds that the actus reus of aiding and abetting in international criminal law requires practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.

3. Mens Rea

(a) International Case Law

236. With regard to mens rea, the Trial Chamber must determine whether it is necessary for the accomplice to share the mens rea of the principal or whether mere knowledge that his actions assist the perpetrator in the commission of the crime is sufficient to constitute mens rea in aiding and abetting the crime. The case law indicates that the latter will suffice.

237. For example in the Einsatzgruppen case, knowledge, rather than intent, was held to be the requisite mental element.

238. The same position was taken in Zyklon B where the prosecution did not attempt to prove that the accused acted with the intention of assisting the killing of the internees. It was accepted that their purpose was to sell insecticide to the SS (for profit, that is a lawful goal pursued by lawful means). The charge as accepted by the court was that they knew what the buyer in fact intended to do with the product they were supplying.

3060

S687

239. Two of the not guilty verdicts in Schonfeld also provide an indication of the mens rea necessary to amount to being "concerned in the killing". Both concerned drivers who claimed to have followed instructions without knowing the purpose of the mission, and were therefore found not guilty. Despite having made a physical contribution to the commission of the offence, they had no knowledge that they were doing so.

240. In the Hechingen Deportation case, the court of first instance considered the mens rea required for aiding and abetting and concluded that this mental element encompassed both the knowledge of the crime being committed by the principals and the awareness of supporting, by aiding and abetting, the criminal conduct of the principals.

As mentioned above, the subsequent acquittal of the accused Ho., K., and B. on appeal was based on a different legal standard concerning the mens rea of those accused, requiring the aider and abettor to have acted out of the same cast of mind as the principal.

241. Finally, in the Tadić Judgment it was found that the test of mens rea which emerged from the post-Second World War trials is "awareness of the act of participation coupled with a conscious decision to participate". The requirement adopted by the Trial Chamber was that the mental element for aiding and abetting consists of a knowing participation in the commission of an offence.

(b) International Instruments

242. Article 2(3)(d) of the International Law Commission's Draft Code on Crimes and Offences Against Mankind, provides that the mens rea required is that the assistance be given "knowingly". The Commentary adds:

> Thus, an individual who provides some assistance to another individual without knowing that this assistance will facilitate the commission of a crime would not be held accountable under the present sub-paragraph.

243. Therefore, it is not necessary for an aider and abettor to meet all the requirements of mens rea for a principal perpetrator. In particular, it is not necessary that he shares and identifies with the principal's criminal will and purpose, provided that his own conduct was with knowledge. That conduct may in itself be perfectly lawful; it becomes criminal only when combined with the principal's unlawful conduct.

244. Reference should also be made to article 30 of the Rome Statute, which provides that, "[u]nless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge".

(c) Conclusions

245. The above analysis leads the Trial Chamber to the conclusion that it is not necessary for the accomplice to share the mens rea of the perpetrator, in the sense of positive intention to commit the crime. Instead, the clear requirement in the vast majority of the cases is for the accomplice to have knowledge that his actions will assist the perpetrator in the commission of the crime. This is particularly apparent from all the cases in which persons were convicted for having driven victims and perpetrators to the site of an execution. In those cases the prosecution did not prove that the driver drove for the purpose of assisting in the killing, that is, with an intention to kill: it was the knowledge of the criminal purpose of the executioners that rendered the driver liable as an aider and abettor. Consequently, if it were not proven that a driver would reasonably have known that the purpose of the trip was an unlawful execution, he would be acquitted.

3061

S888

[illegible] Moreover, it is not necessary that the aider and abettor should know the precise crime [illegible] was intended and which in the event was committed. If he is aware that one of a number [illegible] crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, he has [illegible]ended to facilitate the commission of that crime, and is guilty as an aider and abettor.

[illegible]7. Knowledge is also the requirement in the International Law Commission Draft Code, [illegible]ch may well reflect the requirement of mens rea in customary international law. This is the [illegible]ndard adopted by this Tribunal in the Tadić Judgement, although sometimes somewhat [illegible]sleadingly expressed as "intent".

[illegible]

[illegible]9. In sum, the Trial Chamber holds the legal ingredients of aiding and abetting in international criminal law to be the following: the actus reus consists of practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime. The mens rea required is the knowledge that these acts assist the commission of the offence. This notion of aiding and abetting is to be distinguished from the notion of common design, where the actus reus consists of participation in a joint criminal enterprise and the mens rea required is intent to participate.

E. How to Distinguish Perpetration of Torture from Aiding and Abetting Torture

250. The definitions and propositions concerning aiding and abetting enunciated above apply equally to rape and to torture, and indeed to all crimes. Nevertheless, the Trial Chamber deems it useful to address the issue of who may be held responsible for torture as a perpetrator and who as an aider and abettor, since in modern times the infliction of torture typically involves a large number of people, each performing his or her individual function, and it is appropriate to elaborate the principles of individual criminal responsibility applicable thereto.

251. Under current international law, individuals must refrain from perpetrating torture or in any way participating in torture.

252. To determine whether an individual is a perpetrator or co-perpetrator of torture or must instead be regarded as an aider and abettor, or is even not to be regarded as criminally liable, it is crucial to ascertain whether the individual who takes part in the torture process also partakes of the purpose behind torture (that is, acts with the intention of obtaining information or a confession, of punishing, intimidating, humiliating or coercing the victim or a third person, or of discriminating, on any ground, against the victim or a third person). If he does not, but gives some sort of assistance and support with the knowledge however that torture is being practised, then the individual may be found guilty of aiding and abetting in the perpetration of torture. Arguably, if the person attending the torture process neither shares in the purpose behind torture nor in any way assists in its perpetration, then he or she should not be regarded as criminally liable (think for example of the soldier whom a superior has ordered to attend a torture session in order to determine whether that soldier can stomach the sight of torture and thus be trained as a torturer).

253. These legal propositions, which are based on a logical interpretation of the customary rules on torture, are supported by a teleological construction of these rules. To demonstrate this point, account must be taken of some modern trends in many States practicing torture: they tend to "compartmentalise" and "dilute" the moral and psychological burden of perpetrating torture by assigning to different individuals a partial (and sometimes relatively minor) role in the torture process. Thus, one person orders that torture be carried out, another organises the whole process at the administrative level, another asks questions while the detainee is being tortured, a fourth one provides or prepares the tools for executing torture, another physically inflicts torture or causes mental suffering, another furnishes medical assistance so as to prevent the detainee from dying as a consequence of torture or from subsequently showing physical traces of the sufferings he has undergone, another processes the results of interrogation known to be obtained under torture, and another procures the information gained as a result of the torture in exchange for granting the torturer immunity from prosecution.

3062

254. International law, were it to fail to take account of these modern trends, would prove unable to cope with this despicable practice. The rules of construction emphasising the importance of the object and purpose of international norms lead to the conclusion that international law renders all the aforementioned persons equally accountable, although some may be sentenced more severely than others, depending upon the circumstances. In other words, the nature of the crime and the forms that it takes, as well as the intensity of international condemnation of torture, suggest that in the case of torture all those who in some degree participate in the crime and in particular take part in the pursuance of one of its underlying purposes, are equally liable.

255. This, it deserves to be stressed, is to a large extent consistent with the provisions contained in the Torture Convention of 1984 and the Inter-American Convention of 1985, from which it can be inferred that they prohibit not only the physical infliction of torture but also any deliberate participation in this practice.

256. It follows, inter alia, that if an official interrogates a detainee while another person is inflicting severe pain or suffering, the interrogator is as guilty of torture as the person causing the severe pain or suffering, even if he does not in any way physically participate in such infliction. Here the criminal law maxim quis per alium facit per se ipsum facere videtur (he who acts through others is regarded as acting himself) fully applies.

257. Furthermore, it follows from the above that, at least in those instances where torture is practiced under the pattern described supra, that is, with more than one person acting as co-perpetrators of the crime, accomplice liability (that is, the criminal liability of those who, while not partaking of the purpose behind torture, may nevertheless be held responsible for encouraging or assisting in the commission of the crime) may only occur within very narrow confines. Thus, it would seem that aiding and abetting in the commission of torture may only exist in such very limited instances as, for example, driving the torturers to the place of torture in full knowledge of the acts they are going to perform there; or bringing food and drink to the perpetrators at the place of torture, again in full knowledge of the activity they are carrying out there. In these instances, those aiding and abetting in the commission of torture can be regarded as accessories to the crime. By contrast, at least in the case we are now discussing, all other varying forms of direct participation in torture should be regarded as instances of co-perpetration of the crime and those co-perpetrators should all be held to be principals. Nevertheless, the varying degree of direct participation as principals may still be a matter to consider for sentencing purposes.

Thus to summarise the above:

(i) to be guilty of torture as a perpetrator (or co-perpetrator), the accused must participate in an integral part of the torture and partake of the purpose behind the torture, that is the intent to obtain information or a confession, to punish or intimidate, humiliate, coerce or discriminate against the victim or a third person.

(ii) to be guilty of torture as an aider or abettor, the accused must assist in some way which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime and with knowledge that torture is taking place.

In a subsequent case, the Appeals Chamber in Blaškić endorsed the notion that aiding and abetting could occur through omission:

47. The Trial Chamber further stated that the actus reus of aiding and abetting may be perpetrated through an omission, "provided this failure to act had a decisive effect on the commission of the crime and that it was coupled with the requisite mens rea." It considered:

S6-96

> In this respect, the mere presence at the crime scene of a person with superior authority, such as a military commander, is a probative indication for determining whether that person encouraged or supported the perpetrators of the crime.

The Appeals Chamber leaves open the possibility that in the circumstances of a given case, an omission may constitute the actus reus of aiding and abetting.

In relation to aiding and abetting by omission, the first clear-cut case of conviction by a contemporary international tribunal for failure to carry out a duty incumbent upon the accused on the basis of the laws of war came on 5 May 2009, with the Mrkšić Appeal Judgment. In that Judgment, the ICTY Appeals Chamber found (§102) that the accused Veselin Šljivančanin's 'failure to act pursuant to his duty [to protect prisoners of war] substantially contributed to the killing of the prisoners of war'.

USA*, Khulumani v. Barclay National Bank Ltd. et al., *US Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, Judgment of 12 October 2007

Three groups of plaintiffs brought a civil action in United States federal court under the Alien Tort Claims Act (ATCA) against various international corporations that did business in South Africa alleging that the corporations aided and abetted the apartheid regime in South Africa in the commission of torture and extrajudicial killings. In order to prevail on their claim, the plaintiffs were required to demonstrate that the principle of aiding and abetting is established in customary international law. The case is still pending. The following is from the concurring opinion of Judge Katzmann.

[...] I conclude that the recognition of the individual responsibility of a defendant who aids and abets a violation of international law is one of those rules "that States universally abide by, or accede to, out of a sense of legal obligation and mutual concern." Recognized as part of the customary law which authorized and was applied by the war crimes trials following the Second World War, it has been frequently invoked in international law instruments as an accepted mode of liability. During the second half of the twentieth century and into this century, it has been repeatedly recognized in numerous international treaties, most notably the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, and in the statutes creating the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia ("ICTY") and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda ("ICTR"). Indeed, the United States concedes, and the defendants do not dispute, that the concept of criminal aiding and abetting liability is "well established" in international law.

Judge Katzmann engages in a comprehensive review of international criminal law sources to support this conclusion before turning to an examination of the mens rea requirement.

Still the Rome Statute's mens rea standard is entirely consistent with the application of accomplice liability under the sources of international law discussed above. For example, in the Ministries Case conducted under Control Council Law No. 10, the tribunal declined to impose criminal liability on a bank officer who was alleged to have "made a loan, knowing or having good reason to believe that the borrower would use the funds in financing enterprise conducted in violation of either national or international law," but was not proven to have made the loan with the purpose of facilitating the enterprise's illegal activities. Meanwhile, a person who assists in the commission of a crime with the purpose of facilitating that crime would be subject to aiding and abetting liability under the statutes governing the ICTY and ICTR. My research has revealed no source of international law that recognizes liability for aiding and abetting a violation of international law but would not authorize the imposition of such liability on a party who acts with the purpose of facilitating that violation (provided, of course, that the actus reus requirement is also satisfied).

[redacted]

3064

S891

With respect to the actus reus component of the aiding and abetting liability, the international legislation is less helpful in identifying a specific standard. However, in the course of its analysis of customary international law, the ICTY concluded that "the actus reus of aiding and abetting in international criminal law requires practical assistance, encouragement or moral support which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime." Furundzija Trial Chamber Judgment, ¶ 235 (second emphasis added). My research has uncovered nothing to indicate that a standard other than "substantial assistance" should apply.

Accordingly, I conclude that a defendant may be held liable under international law for aiding and abetting the violation of that law by another when the defendant (1) provides practical assistance to the principal which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime and (2) does so with the purpose of facilitating the commission of that crime. Further, based on this review of international law's treatment of aiding and abetting liability over the past sixty years, I conclude that aiding and abetting liability, as defined, is sufficiently "well-established [and] universally recognized" to be considered customary international law for the purposes of the ATCA.

QUESTIONS

1. Normatively where is the right place to draw the line between innocent and culpable contributions to mass crimes? Should the focus be on the actus reus or on the mens rea?
2. Aiding and abetting by omission requires, inter alia, the failure to fulfill a duty. What kinds of duties should give rise to the possibility of such liability?
3. Given the potentially broad scope of aiding and abetting liability, does it ultimately depend on the judicious exercise of prosecutorial discretion?

[12] These Tribunals would also extend liability to individuals who merely had "knowledge that acts assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal." Any individual who acts with the purpose to facilitate the commission of a crime would necessarily act with such knowledge. Thus, I do not see the articulation of a broader definition by the ICTY as detracting from my position that liability in accordance with the purposefulness standard is well-established and universally recognized under international law. The critical question is whether there is a discernable core definition that commands the same level of consensus as the 18th-century crimes identified by the Supreme Court in United States v. Sosa. I believe that the definition I adopt is such a definition.

3065

FURTHER READING

Cassese, International Criminal Law, 214–18.

A. Eser, 'Individual Criminal Responsibility', in A. Cassese et al. (eds), International Criminal Court Commentary, vol. 1 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002), 798–801.

O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (The Netherlands: IOS Press, 2008), 754–7.

Werle, Principles, 182–5.

S892

3066

THE INTERNATIONAL LAW COMMISSION'S ARTICLES ON STATE RESPONSIBILITY

Introduction, Text and Commentaries

JAMES CRAWFORD

CAMBRIDGE
UNIVERSITY PRESS

S193

3067

PUBLISHED BY THE PRESS SYNDICATE OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE
The Pitt Building, Trumpington Street, Cambridge, United Kingdom

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS
The Edinburgh Building, Cambridge CB2 2RU, UK
40 West 20th Street, New York, NY 10011-4211, USA
477 Williamstown Road, Port Melbourne, VIC 3207, Australia
Ruiz de Alarcón 13, 28014 Madrid, Spain
Dock House, The Waterfront, Cape Town 8001, South Africa

http://www.cambridge.org

© In editorial matter James Crawford 2002

This book is in copyright. Subject to statutory exception and to the provisions of relevant collective licensing agreements, no reproduction of any part may take place without the written permission of Cambridge University Press.

First published 2002

Printed in the United Kingdom at the University Press, Cambridge

Typeface Times 9/11 pt System LaTeX 2$_\varepsilon$ [TB]

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

ISBN 0 521 81353 0 hardback
ISBN 0 521 01389 5 paperback

UNIV.
LEIDEN BIBL.

S694

3068 series has occurred to constitute the wrongful ded as having occurred over the whole period ission. If this were not so, the effectiveness of d.

serted to deal with the intertemporal principle at principle, the State must be bound by the which the series of acts making up the breach bligation did not exist at the beginning of the eafter, the "first" of the actions or omissions onsibility will be the first occurring after the ot prevent a court taking into account earlier in order to establish a factual basis for the later

S695

CHAPTER IV
RESPONSIBILITY OF A STATE IN CONNECTION WITH THE ACT OF ANOTHER STATE

(1) In accordance with the basic principles laid down in Chapter I, each State is responsible for its own internationally wrongful conduct, i.e. for conduct attributable to it under Chapter II which is in breach of an international obligation of that State in accordance with Chapter III.[277] The principle that State responsibility is specific to the State concerned underlies the present Articles as a whole. It will be referred to as the principle of independent responsibility. It is appropriate since each State has its own range of international obligations and its own correlative responsibilities.

(2) However, internationally wrongful conduct often results from the collaboration of several States rather than of one State acting alone.[278] This may involve independent conduct by several States, each playing its own role in carrying out an internationally wrongful act. Or it may be that a number of States act through a common organ to commit a wrongful act.[279] Internationally wrongful conduct can also arise out of situations where a State acts on behalf of another State in carrying out the conduct in question.

(3) Various forms of collaborative conduct can co-exist in the same case. For example, three States, Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, together constituted the Administering Authority for the Trust Territory of Nauru. In Certain Phosphate Lands in Nauru proceedings were commenced against Australia alone in respect of acts performed on the "joint behalf" of the three States.[280] The acts performed by Australia involved both "joint" conduct of several States and day-to-day administration of a territory by one State acting on behalf of other States as well as on its own behalf. By contrast, if the relevant organ of the acting State is merely "placed at the disposal" of the requesting State, in the sense provided for in article 6, only the requesting State is responsible for the act in question.

(4) In certain circumstances the wrongfulness of a State's conduct may depend on the independent action of another State. A State may engage in conduct in a situation where another State is involved and the conduct of the other State may be relevant or even decisive in assessing whether the first State has breached its own international obligations. For example in the Soering case the European Court of Human Rights held that the proposed 277 See especially article 2 and commentary.

278 See M. L. Padelletti, Pluralità di Stati nel Fatto Illecito Internazionale (Milan, Giuffrè, 1990); I. Brownlie, System of the Law of Nations: State Responsibility (Part I) (Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1983), pp. 189-192; J. Quigley, "Complicity in International Law: A New Direction in the Law of State Responsibility", B.Y.I.L., vol. 57 (1986), p. 77; J. E. Noyes & B. D. Smith, "State Responsibility and the Principle of Joint and Several Liability", Yale Journal of International Law, vol. 13 (1988), p. 225; B. Graefrath, "Complicity in the Law of International Responsibility", Revue belge de droit international, vol. 29 (1996), p. 370.

279 In some cases the act in question may be committed by the organs of an international organization. This raises issues of the international responsibility of international organizations which fall outside the scope of the present Articles. See article 57 and commentary.

280 Certain Phosphate Lands in Nauru (Nauru v. Australia), Preliminary Objections, I.C.J. Reports 1992, p. 240, at p. 258, para. 47; see also the separate opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, ibid., p. 284.

3069

extradition of a person to a State not party to the European Convention where he was likely to suffer inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment involved a breach of article 3 of the Convention by the extraditing State.[281] Alternatively a State may be required by its own international obligations to prevent certain conduct by another State, or at least to prevent the harm that would flow from such conduct. Thus the basis of responsibility in the Corfu Channel case[282] was Albania's failure to warn the United Kingdom of the presence of mines in Albanian waters which had been laid by a third State. Albania's responsibility in the circumstances was original and not derived from the wrongfulness of the conduct of any other State.

(5) In most cases of collaborative conduct by States, responsibility for the wrongful act will be determined according to the principle of independent responsibility referred to in paragraph (1) above. But there may be cases where conduct of the organ of one State, not acting as an organ or agent of another State, is nonetheless chargeable to the latter State, and this may be so even though the wrongfulness of the conduct lies, or at any rate primarily lies, in a breach of the international obligations of the former. Chapter IV of Part One defines these exceptional cases where it is appropriate that one State should assume responsibility for the internationally wrongful act of another.

(6) Three situations are covered in Chapter IV. Article 16 deals with cases where one State provides aid or assistance to another State with a view to assisting in the commission of a wrongful act by the latter. Article 17 deals with cases where one State is responsible for the internationally wrongful act of another State because it has exercised powers of direction and control over the commission of an internationally wrongful act by the latter. Article 18 deals with the extreme case where one State deliberately coerces another into committing an act which is, or but for the coercion would be,[283] an internationally wrongful act on the part of the coerced State. In all three cases, the act in question is still committed, voluntarily or otherwise, by organs or agents of the acting State, and is or, but for the coercion, would be a breach of that State's international obligations. The implication of the second State in that breach arises from the special circumstance of its willing assistance in, its direction and control over or its coercion of the acting State. But there are important differences between the three cases. Under article 16, the State primarily responsible is the acting State and the assisting State has a merely supporting role. Similarly under article 17, the acting State commits the internationally wrongful act, albeit under the direction and control of another State. By contrast, in the case of coercion under article 18, the coercing State is the prime mover in respect of the conduct and the coerced State is merely its instrument.

(7) A feature of this Chapter is that it specifies certain conduct as internationally wrongful. This may seem to blur the distinction maintained in the articles between the primary or substantive obligations of the State and its secondary obligations of responsibility.[284]

281 Soering v. United Kingdom, E.C.H.R., Series A, No. 161 (1989), at pp. 33-36, paras. 85-91. See also Cruz Varas v. Sweden, E.C.H.R., Series A, No. 201 (1991), at p. 28, paras. 69-70; Vilvarajah v. United Kingdom, E.C.H.R., Series A, No. 215 (1991), at p. 37, paras. 115-116.

282 Corfu Channel, Merits, I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 4, at p. 22.

283 If a State has been coerced, the wrongfulness of its act may be precluded by force majeure: see article 23 and commentary.

284 See above, Introduction to the Articles, paras. (1), (2), (4) for an explanation of the distinction.

3070

ɔpean Convention where he was likely ment involved a breach of article 3 of tively a State may be required by its nduct by another State, or at least to . Thus the basis of responsibility in the ı the United Kingdom of the presence a third State. Albania's responsibility ɔm the wrongfulness of the conduct of tes, responsibility for the wrongful act lependent responsibility referred to in conduct of the organ of one State, not eless chargeable to the latter State, and ɔnduct lies, or at any rate primarily lies, ɔrmer. Chapter IV of Part One defines ɔne State should assume responsibility

Article 16 deals with cases where one ı a view to assisting in the commission ases where one State is responsible for use it has exercised powers of direction y wrongful act by the latter. Article 18 ately coerces another into committing an internationally wrongful act on the question is still committed, voluntarily
, and is or, but for the coercion, would
The implication of the second State in s willing assistance in, its direction and ıere are important differences between responsible is the acting State and the arly under article 17, the acting State er the direction and control of another cle 18, the coercing State is the prime te is merely its instrument.

rtain conduct as internationally wronged in the articles between the primary ndary obligations of responsibility.[284]

1989), at pp. 33-36, paras. 85-91. See also ), at p. 28, paras. 69-70; Vilvarajah v. United ıras. 115-116.

ıy be precluded by force majeure: see for an explanation of the distinction.

5697

It is justified on the basis that responsibility under Chapter IV is in a sense derivative.[285] In national legal systems, rules dealing, for example, with conspiracy, complicity and inducing breach of contract may be classified as falling within the "general part" of the law of obligations. Moreover, the idea of the implication of one State in the conduct of another is analogous to problems of attribution, dealt with in Chapter II.

(8) On the other hand, the situations covered in Chapter IV have a special character. They are exceptions to the principle of independent responsibility and they only cover certain cases. In formulating these exceptional cases where one State is responsible for the internationally wrongful acts of another, it is necessary to bear in mind certain features of the international system. First, there is the possibility that the same conduct may be internationally wrongful so far as one State is concerned but not for another State having regard to its own international obligations. Rules of derived responsibility cannot be allowed to undermine the principle, stated in article 34 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, that a treaty "does not create either obligations or rights for a third State without its consent"; similar issues arise with respect to unilateral obligations and even, in certain cases, rules of general international law. Hence it is only in the extreme case of coercion that a State may become responsible under this Chapter for conduct which would not have been internationally wrongful if performed by that State. Secondly, States engage in a wide variety of activities through a multiplicity of organs and agencies. For example, a State providing financial or other aid to another State should not be required to assume the risk that the latter will divert the aid for purposes which may be internationally unlawful. Thus it is necessary to establish a close connection between the action of the assisting, directing or coercing State on the one hand and that of the State committing the internationally wrongful act on the other. Thus the articles in this Part require that the former State should be aware of the circumstances of the internationally wrongful act in question, and establish a specific causal link between that act and the conduct of the assisting, directing or coercing State. This is done without prejudice to the general question of "wrongful intent" in matters of State responsibility, on which the articles are neutral.[286]

(9) Similar considerations dictate the exclusion of certain situations of "derived responsibility" from Chapter IV. One of these is incitement. The incitement of wrongful conduct is generally not regarded as sufficient to give rise to responsibility on the part of the inciting State, if it is not accompanied by concrete support or does not involve direction and control on the part of the inciting State.[287] However, there can be specific treaty obligations prohibiting incitement under certain circumstances.[288] Another concerns the issue which is described in some systems of internal law as being an "accessory after the fact". It seems that there is no general obligation on the part of third States to cooperate in suppressing 285 Cf. the term "responsabilité dérivée" used by Arbitrator Huber in British Claims in the Spanish Zone of Morocco, R.I.A.A., vol. II, p. 615 (1924), at p. 648.

286 See above, commentary to article 2, paras. (3) and (10).

287 See the statement of United States-French Commissioners relating to the French Indemnity of 1831, in Moore, International Arbitrations, vol. V, p. 4397, at pp. 4473-75. See also Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America), Merits, I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 14, at p. 129, para. 255, and the dissenting opinion of Judge Schwebel, ibid., p. 379, para. 259.

288 Cf., e.g., art. III (c) of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, 9 December 1948, U.N.T.S., vol. 78, p. 277; art. 4 of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, 7 March 1966, U.N.T.S., vol. 660, p. 195.

3071

5698

internationally wrongful conduct of another State which may already have occurred. Again it is a matter for specific treaty obligations to establish any such obligation of suppression after the event. There are, however, two important qualifications here. First, in some circumstances assistance given by one State to another after the latter has committed an internationally wrongful act may amount to the adoption of that act by the former State. In such cases responsibility for that act potentially arises pursuant to article 11. Secondly, special obligations of cooperation in putting an end to an unlawful situation arise in the case of serious breaches of obligations under peremptory norms of general international law. By definition, in such cases States will have agreed that no derogation from such obligations is to be permitted and, faced with a serious breach of such an obligation, certain obligations of cooperation arise. These are dealt with in article 41.

ARTICLE 16

Aid or assistance in the commission of an internationally wrongful act

A State which aids or assists another State in the commission of an internationally wrongful act by the latter is internationally responsible for doing so if:

(a) that State does so with knowledge of the circumstances of the internationally wrongful act; and

(b) the act would be internationally wrongful if committed by that State.

Commentary

(1) Article 16 deals with the situation where one State provides aid or assistance to another with a view to facilitating the commission of an internationally wrongful act by the latter. Such situations arise where a State voluntarily assists or aids another State in carrying out conduct which violates the international obligations of the latter, for example, by knowingly providing an essential facility or financing the activity in question. Other examples include providing means for the closing of an international waterway, facilitating the abduction of persons on foreign soil, or assisting in the destruction of property belonging to nationals of a third country. The State primarily responsible in each case is the acting State, and the assisting State has only a supporting role. Hence the use of the term "by the latter" in the chapeau to article 16, which distinguishes the situation of aid or assistance from that of co-perpetrators or co-participants in an internationally wrongful act. Under article 16, aid or assistance by the assisting State is not to be confused with the responsibility of the acting State. In such a case, the assisting State will only be responsible to the extent that its own conduct has caused or contributed to the internationally wrongful act. Thus in cases where that internationally wrongful act would clearly have occurred in any event, the responsibility of the assisting State will not extend to compensating for the act itself.

(2) Various specific substantive rules exist, prohibiting one State from providing assistance in the commission of certain wrongful acts by other States or even requiring third States to prevent or repress such acts.[289] Such provisions do not rely on any general principle 289 See, e.g., G.A. Res. 2625 (XXV) of 24 October 1970, first principle, para. 9; G.A. Res. 3314 (XXIX) of 14 December 1974, annex, art. 3 (f).

3072

; which may already have occurred. Again
:stablish any such obligation of suppresportant qualifications here. First, in some another after the latter has committed an adoption of that act by the former State. ly arises pursuant to article 11. Secondly, ıd to an unlawful situation arise in the case ɔry norms of general international law. By hat no derogation from such obligations is of such an obligation, certain obligations
:le 41.

16

'an internationally wrongful act

State in the commission of an er is internationally responsible nowledge of the circumstances ıct; and tionally wrongful if committed ary

ɜ one State provides aid or assistance to ion of an internationally wrongful act by oluntarily assists or aids another State in onal obligations of the latter, for example, financing the activity in question. Other g of an international waterway, facilitating ng in the destruction of property belonging rily responsible in each case is the acting ng role. Hence the use of the term "by the ishes the situation of aid or assistance from nternationally wrongful act. Under article t to be confused with the responsibility of ate will only be responsible to the extent ) the internationally wrongful act. Thus in uld clearly have occurred in any event, the ıd to compensating for the act itself.

ohibiting one State from providing assists by other States or even requiring third /isions do not rely on any general principle

, first principle, para. 9; G.A. Res. 3314 (XXIX) of derived responsibility, nor do they deny the existence of such a principle, and it would be wrong to infer from them the non-existence of any general rule. As to treaty provisions such as Article 2 (5) of the United Nations Charter, again these have a specific rationale which goes well beyond the scope and purpose of article 16.

(3) Article 16 limits the scope of responsibility for aid or assistance in three ways. First, the relevant State organ or agency providing aid or assistance must be aware of the circumstances making the conduct of the assisted State internationally wrongful; secondly, the aid or assistance must be given with a view to facilitating the commission of that act, and must actually do so; and thirdly, the completed act must be such that it would have been wrongful had it been committed by the assisting State itself.

(4) The requirement that the assisting State be aware of the circumstances making the conduct of the assisted State internationally wrongful is reflected by the phrase "knowledge of the circumstances of the internationally wrongful act". A State providing material or financial assistance or aid to another State does not normally assume the risk that its assistance or aid may be used to carry out an internationally wrongful act. If the assisting or aiding State is unaware of the circumstances in which its aid or assistance is intended to be used by the other State, it bears no international responsibility.

(5) The second requirement is that the aid or assistance must be given with a view to facilitating the commission of the wrongful act, and must actually do so. This limits the application of article 16 to those cases where the aid or assistance given is clearly linked to the subsequent wrongful conduct. A State is not responsible for aid or assistance under article 16 unless the relevant State organ intended, by the aid or assistance given, to facilitate the occurrence of the wrongful conduct and the internationally wrongful conduct is actually committed by the aided or assisted State. There is no requirement that the aid or assistance should have been essential to the performance of the internationally wrongful act; it is sufficient if it contributed significantly to that act.

(6) The third condition limits article 16 to aid or assistance in the breach of obligations by which the aiding or assisting State is itself bound. An aiding or assisting State may not deliberately procure the breach by another State of an obligation by which both States are bound; a State cannot do by another what it cannot do by itself. On the other hand, a State is not bound by obligations of another State vis-à-vis third States. This basic principle is also embodied in articles 34 and 35 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.[290] Correspondingly, a State is free to act for itself in a way which is inconsistent with obligations of another State vis-à-vis third States. Any question of responsibility in such cases will be a matter for the State to whom assistance is provided vis-à-vis the injured State. Thus it is a necessary requirement for the responsibility of an assisting State that the conduct in question, if attributable to the assisting State, would have constituted a breach of its own international obligations.

(7) State practice supports assigning international responsibility to a State which deliberately participates in the internationally wrongful conduct of another through the provision of aid or assistance, in circumstances where the obligation breached is equally opposable to the assisting State. For example, in 1984 Iran protested against the supply of financial and military aid to Iraq by the United Kingdom, which allegedly included chemical weapons used in attacks against Iranian troops, on the ground that the assistance was facilitating acts of aggression by Iraq.[291] The British government denied both the allegation that it had chemical weapons and that it had supplied them to Iraq.[292] In 1998, a similar allegation surfaced that Sudan had assisted Iraq to manufacture chemical weapons by allowing Sudanese installations to be used by Iraqi technicians for steps in the production of nerve gas. The allegation was denied by Iraq's representative to the United Nations.[293]

290 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 23 May 1969, U.N.T.S., vol. 1155, p. 331.

3073

5700

(8) The obligation not to use force may also be breached by an assisting State through permitting the use of its territory by another State to carry out an armed attack against a third State. An example is provided by a statement made by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany in response to an allegation that Germany had participated in an armed attack by allowing United States military aircraft to use airfields in its territory in connection with the United States intervention in Lebanon. While denying that the measures taken by the United States and the United Kingdom in the Near East constituted intervention, the Federal Republic of Germany nevertheless seems to have accepted that the act of a State in placing its own territory at the disposal of another State in order to facilitate the commission of an unlawful use of force by that other State was itself an internationally wrongful act.[294] Another example arises from the Tripoli bombing incident in April 1986. Libya charged the United Kingdom with responsibility for the event, based on the fact that the United Kingdom had allowed several of its air bases to be used for the launching of American fighter planes to attack Libyan targets.[295] Libya asserted that the United Kingdom "would be held partly responsible" for having "supported and contributed in a direct way" to the raid.[296] The United Kingdom denied responsibility on the basis that the raid by the United States was lawful as an act of self-defence against Libyan terrorist attacks on American targets.[297] A proposed Security Council resolution concerning the attack was vetoed, but the United Nations General Assembly issued a resolution condemning the "military attack" as "a violation of the Charter of the United Nations and of international law", and calling upon all States "to refrain from extending any assistance or facilities for perpetrating acts of aggression against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya."[298]

(9) The obligation not to provide aid or assistance to facilitate the commission of an internationally wrongful act by another State is not limited to the prohibition on the use of force. For instance, a State may incur responsibility if it assists another State to circumvent sanctions imposed by the United Nations Security Council[299] or provides material aid to a State that uses the aid to commit human rights violations. In this respect, the United

291 See New York Times, 6 March 1984, p. A1, col. 1.
292 See New York Times, 5 March 1984, p. A3, col. 1.
293 See New York Times, 26 August 1998, p. A8, col. 1.
294 For the text of the note see Z.a.ö.R.V., vol. 20 (1960), pp. 663-664.
295 See United States of America, Department of State Bulletin, No. 2111, June 1986, p. 8.
296 See the statement of Ambassador Hamed Houdeiry, Libyan People's Bureau, Paris, The Times, 16 April 1986, p. 6, col. 7.
297 Statement of Mrs. Margaret Thatcher, Prime Minister, House of Commons Debates, 6th series, vol. 95, col. 737 (15 April 1986), reprinted in B.Y.I.L., vol. 57 (1986), p. 638.
298 See G.A. Res. 41/38 of 20 November 1986, paras. 1, 3.
299 See, e.g., Report by President Clinton, A.J.I.L., vol. 91 (1997), p. 709.

3074

llegedly included chemical weapons
d that the assistance was facilitating : denied both the allegation that it had q.[292] In 1998, a similar allegation sur-mical weapons by allowing Sudanese s in the production of nerve gas. The United Nations.[293]

reached by an assisting State through ) carry out an armed attack against a ade by the Government of the Federal that Germany had participated in an
:raft to use airfields in its territory in :banon. While denying that the meaingdom in the Near East constituted
:rtheless seems to have accepted that disposal of another State in order to rce by that other State was itself an rises from the Tripoli bombing inci-lom with responsibility for the event, ved several of its air bases to be used ack Libyan targets.[295] Libya asserted ponsible" for having "supported and ed Kingdom denied responsibility on /ful as an act of self-defence against )roposed Security Council resolution Nations General Assembly issued a iolation of the Charter of the United all States "to refrain from extending aggression against the Libyan Arab ce to facilitate the commission of an imited to the prohibition on the use of f it assists another State to circumvent Council[299] or provides material aid to 'iolations. In this respect, the United 563-664.

in, No. 2111, June 1986, p. 8.
n People's Bureau, Paris, The Times, 16 use of Commons Debates, 6th series, vol. 95, 36), p. 638.

997), p. 709.

5701

Nations General Assembly has called on member States in a number of cases to refrain from supplying arms and other military assistance to countries found to be committing serious human rights violations.[300] Where the allegation is that the assistance of a State has facilitated human rights abuses by another State, the particular circumstances of each case must be carefully examined to determine whether the aiding State by its aid was aware of and intended to facilitate the commission of the internationally wrongful conduct.

(10) In accordance with article 16, the assisting State is responsible for its own act in deliberately assisting another State to breach an international obligation by which they are both bound. It is not responsible, as such, for the act of the assisted State. In some cases this may be a distinction without a difference: where the assistance is a necessary element in the wrongful act in absence of which it could not have occurred, the injury suffered can be concurrently attributed to the assisting and the acting State.[301] In other cases, however, the difference may be very material: the assistance may have been only an incidental factor in the commission of the primary act, and may have contributed only to a minor degree, if at all, to the injury suffered. By assisting another State to commit an internationally wrongful act, a State should not necessarily be held to indemnify the victim for all the consequences of the act, but only for those which, in accordance with the principles stated in Part Two of the articles, flow from its own conduct.

(11) Article 16 does not address the question of the admissibility of judicial proceedings to establish the responsibility of the aiding or assisting State in the absence of or without the consent of the aided or assisted State. The International Court has repeatedly affirmed that it cannot decide on the international responsibility of a State if, in order to do so, "it would have to rule, as a prerequisite, on the lawfulness"[302] of the conduct of another State, in the latter's absence and without its consent. This is the so-called Monetary Gold principle.[303] That principle may well apply to cases under article 16, since it is of the essence of the responsibility of the aiding or assisting State that the aided or assisted State itself committed an internationally wrongful act. The wrongfulness of the aid or assistance given by the former is dependent, inter alia, on the wrongfulness of the conduct of the latter. This may present practical difficulties in some cases in establishing the responsibility of the aiding or assisting State, but it does not vitiate the purpose of article 16. The Monetary Gold principle is concerned with the admissibility of claims in international judicial proceedings, not with questions of responsibility as such. Moreover that principle is not all-embracing, and the Monetary Gold principle may not be a barrier to judicial proceedings in every case. In any event, wrongful assistance given to another State has frequently led to diplomatic protests. States are entitled to assert complicity in the wrongful conduct of another State even though no international court may have jurisdiction to rule on the charge, at all or in the absence of the other State.

300 Report of the Economic and Social Council, Report of the Third Committee of the General Assembly, Draft Resolution XVII, 14 December 1982, A/37/745, p. 50.
301 For the question of concurrent responsibility of several States for the same injury see article 47 and commentary.
302 East Timor (Portugal v. Australia), I.C.J. Reports 1995, p. 90, at p. 105, para. 35.
303 Monetary Gold Removed from Rome in 1943, I.C.J. Reports 1954, p. 19, at p. 32; Certain Phosphate Lands in Nauru (Nauru v. Australia), Preliminary Objections, I.C.J. Reports 1992, p. 240, at p. 261, para. 55.

3075

5702

ARTICLE 17

Direction and control exercised over the commission of an internationally wrongful act

A State which directs and controls another State in the commission of an internationally wrongful act by the latter is internationally responsible for that act if:

(a) that State does so with knowledge of the circumstances of the internationally wrongful act; and

(b) the act would be internationally wrongful if committed by that State.

Commentary

(1) Article 17 deals with a second case of derived responsibility, the exercise of direction and control by one State over the commission of an internationally wrongful act by another. Under article 16 a State providing aid or assistance with a view to the commission of an internationally wrongful act incurs international responsibility only to the extent of the aid or assistance given. By contrast, a State which directs and controls another in the commission of an internationally wrongful act is responsible for the act itself, since it controlled and directed the act in its entirety.

(2) Some examples of international responsibility flowing from the exercise of direction and control over the commission of a wrongful act by another State are now largely of historical significance. International dependency relationships such as "suzerainty" or "protectorate" warranted treating the dominant State as internationally responsible for conduct formally attributable to the dependent State. For example, in Rights of Nationals of the United States in Morocco,[304] France commenced proceedings under the Optional Clause in respect of a dispute concerning the rights of United States nationals in Morocco under French protectorate. The United States objected that any eventual judgment might not be considered as binding upon Morocco, which was not a party to the proceedings. France confirmed that it was acting both in its own name and as the protecting power over Morocco, with the result that the Court's judgment would be binding both on France and on Morocco,[305] and the case proceeded on that basis.[306] The Court's judgment concerned questions of the responsibility of France in respect of the conduct of Morocco which were raised both by the Application and by the United States counter-claim.

(3) With the developments in international relations since 1945, and in particular the process of decolonization, older dependency relationships have been terminated. Such links do not involve any legal right to direction or control on the part of the representing State. In cases of representation, the represented entity remains responsible for its own international

304 Rights of Nationals of the United States of America in Morocco, I.C.J. Reports 1952, p. 176

305 See I.C.J. Pleadings, Rights of Nationals of the United States of America in Morocco, vol. I, p. 235; ibid., vol. II, pp.431-433; the United States thereupon withdrew its preliminary objection: ibid., p. 434.

306 See Rights of Nationals of the United States of America in Morocco, I.C.J. Reports 1952, p. 176, at p. 179.

3076

the commission of an ful act

tate in the commission of an internationally responsible ledge of the circumstances ınd ılly wrongful if committed esponsibility, the exercise of direction ternationally wrongful act by another. with a view to the commission of an nsibility only to the extent of the aid or d controls another in the commission the act itself, since it controlled and flowing from the exercise of direc- act by another State are now largely elationships such as "suzerainty" or is internationally responsible for con- example, in Rights of Nationals of the oceedings under the Optional Clause d States nationals in Morocco under any eventual judgment might not be t a party to the proceedings. France ıd as the protecting power over Mo- ld be binding both on France and on he Court's judgment concerned ques- onduct of Morocco which were raised ıter-claim.

ns since 1945, and in particular the ıips have been terminated. Such links ı the part of the representing State. In responsible for its own international occo, I.C.J. Reports 1952, p. 176 es of America in Morocco, vol. I, p. 235; lrew its preliminary objection: ibid., p. 434.

Morocco, I.C.J. Reports 1952, p. 176, at obligations, even though diplomatic communications may be channelled through another State. The representing State in such cases does not, merely because it is the channel through which communications pass, assume any responsibility for their content. This is not in contradiction to the British Claims in the Spanish Zone of Morocco arbitration, which affirmed that "the responsibility of the protecting State . . . proceeds from the fact that the protecting State alone represents the protected territory in its international relations,"[307] and that the protecting State is answerable "in place of the protected State."[308] The principal concern in the arbitration was to ensure that, in the case of a protectorate which put an end to direct international relations by the protected State, international responsibility for wrongful acts committed by the protected State was not erased to the detriment of third States injured by the wrongful conduct. The acceptance by the protecting State of the obligation to answer in place of the protected State was viewed as an appropriate means of avoiding that danger.[309] The justification for such an acceptance was not based on the relationship of "representation" as such but on the fact that the protecting State was in virtually total control over the protected State. It was not merely acting as a channel of communication.

5703

(4) Other relationships of dependency, such as dependent territories, fall entirely outside the scope of article 17, which is concerned only with the responsibility of one State for the conduct of another State. In most relationships of dependency between one territory and another, the dependent territory, even if it may possess some international personality, is not a State. Even in cases where a component unit of a federal State enters into treaties or other international legal relations in its own right, and not by delegation from the federal State), the component unit is not itself a State in international law. So far as State responsibility is concerned, the position of federal States is no different from that of any other States: the normal principles specified in articles 4 to 9 of the draft articles apply, and the federal State is internationally responsible for the conduct of its component units even though that conduct falls within their own local control under the federal constitution.[310]

(5) Nonetheless, instances exist or can be envisaged where one State exercises the power to direct and control the activities of another State, whether by treaty or as a result of a military occupation or for some other reason. For example, during the belligerent occupation of Italy by Germany in the Second World War, it was generally acknowledged that the Italian police in Rome operated under the control of the occupying Power. Thus the protest by the Holy See in respect of wrongful acts committed by Italian police who forcibly entered the Basilica of St. Paul in Rome in February 1944 asserted the responsibility of the German authorities.[311] In such cases the occupying State is responsible for acts of the occupied State which it directs and controls.

(6) Article 17 is limited to cases where a dominant State actually directs and controls conduct which is a breach of an international obligation of the dependent State. International tribunals have consistently refused to infer responsibility on the part of a dominant State

307 British Claims in the Spanish Zone of Morocco, R.I.A.A., vol. II, p. 615 (1925), at p. 649.
308 Ibid., at p. 648. 309 Ibid.
310 See, e.g., LaGrand (Germany v. United States of America), Provisional Measures, I.C.J. Reports 1999, p. 9, at p. 16, para. 28.
311 See R. Ago, "L'occupazione bellica di Roma e il Trattato lateranense", Comunicazioni e Studi (Milan, Giuffré, 1946), vol. II, pp. 167-168.

3077

merely because the latter may have the power to interfere in matters of administration internal to a dependent State, if that power is not exercised in the particular case. In the Robert E. Brown case,[312] for example, the Arbitral Tribunal held that the authority of Great Britain, as suzerain over the South African Republic prior to the Boer War, "fell far short of what would be required to make her responsible for the wrong inflicted upon Brown."[313] It went on to deny that Great Britain possessed power to interfere in matters of internal administration and continued that there was no evidence "that Great Britain ever did undertake to interfere in this way."[314] Accordingly the relation of suzerainty "did not operate to render Great Britain liable for the acts complained of."[315] In the Heirs of the Duc de Guise case,[316] the Franco-Italian Conciliation Commission held that Italy was responsible for a requisition carried out by Italy in Sicily at a time when it was under Allied occupation. Its decision was not based on the absence of Allied power to requisition the property, or to stop Italy from doing so. Rather the majority pointed to the absence in fact of any "intermeddling on the part of the Commander of the Occupation forces or any Allied authority calling for the requisition decrees".[317] The mere fact that a State may have power to exercise direction and control over another State in some field is not a sufficient basis for attributing to it any wrongful acts of the latter State in that field.[318]

(7) In the formulation of article 17, the term "controls" refers to cases of domination over the commission of wrongful conduct and not simply the exercise of oversight, still less mere influence or concern. Similarly, the word "directs" does not encompass mere incitement or suggestion but rather connotes actual direction of an operative kind. Both direction and control must be exercised over the wrongful conduct in order for a dominant State to incur responsibility. The choice of the expression, common in English, "direction and control", raised some problems in other languages, owing in particular to the ambiguity of the term "direction" which may imply, as is the case in French, complete power, whereas it does not have this implication in English.

(8) Two further conditions attach to responsibility under article 17. First, the dominant State is only responsible if it has knowledge of the circumstances making the conduct of the dependent State wrongful. Secondly, it has to be shown that the completed act would have been wrongful had it been committed by the directing and controlling State itself. This condition is significant in the context of bilateral obligations, which are not opposable to the directing State. In cases of multilateral obligations and especially of obligations to the international community, it is of much less significance. The essential principle is that a State should not be able to do through another what it could not do itself.

312 Brown (United States) v. Great Britain, R.I.A.A., vol. VI, p. 120 (1923).
313 Ibid., at p. 130. 314 Ibid., at p. 131. 315 Ibid.
316 Heirs of the Duc de Guise, R.I.A.A., vol. XIII, p. 150 (1951).
317 Ibid., p. 161. See also, in another context, Drodz & Janousek v. France & Spain, E.C.H.R., Series A, No. 240 (1992); see also Iribarne Pérez v. France, E.C.H.R., Series A, No. 325-C (1995), at pp. 62-63, paras. 29-31.
318 It may be that the fact of the dependence of one State upon another is relevant in terms of the burden of proof, since the mere existence of a formal State apparatus does not exclude the possibility that control was exercised in fact by an occupying Power. Cf. Restitution of Household Effects Belonging to Jews Deported from Hungary (Germany), (1965) I.L.R., vol. 44, p. 301, at pp. 340-342 (Kammergericht, Berlin).

in matters of administration internal ıe particular case. In the Robert E.
ıat the authority of Great Britain, as er War, "fell far short of what would cted upon Brown."[313] It went on to matters of internal administration itain ever did undertake to interfere
"did not operate to render Great rs of the Duc de Guise case,[316] the was responsible for a requisition der Allied occupation. Its decision sition the property, or to stop Italy ence in fact of any "intermeddling or any Allied authority calling for ay have power to exercise direction ficient basis for attributing to it any " refers to cases of domination over exercise of oversight, still less mere es not encompass mere incitement operative kind. Both direction and order for a dominant State to incur n English, "direction and control", icular to the ambiguity of the term omplete power, whereas it does not nder article 17. First, the dominant cumstances making the conduct of own that the completed act would ng and controlling State itself. This ations, which are not opposable to ınd especially of obligations to the e. The essential principle is that a ould not do itself.

0 (1923).

France & Spain, E.C.H.R., Series A, eries A, No. 325-C (1995), at pp. 62-63, other is relevant in terms of the burden of es not exclude the possibility that control

f Household Effects Belonging to Jews 301, at pp. 340-342 (Kammergericht,

5705

(9) As to the responsibility of the directed and controlled State, the mere fact that it was directed to carry out an internationally wrongful act does not constitute an excuse under Chapter V of Part One. If the conduct in question would involve a breach of its international obligations, it is incumbent upon it to decline to comply with the direction. The defence of "superior orders" does not exist for States in international law. This is not to say that the wrongfulness of the directed and controlled State's conduct may not be precluded under Chapter V, but this will only be so if it can show the existence of a circumstance precluding wrongfulness, e.g. force majeure. In such a case it is to the directing State alone that the injured State must look. But as between States, genuine cases of force majeure or coercion are exceptional. Conversely it is no excuse for the directing State to show that the directed State was a willing or even enthusiastic participant in the internationally wrongful conduct, if in truth the conditions laid down in article 17 are met.

3079

5706

ARTICLE 18

Coercion of another State

A State which coerces another State to commit an act is internationally responsible for that act if:

(a) the act would, but for the coercion, be an internationally wrongful act of the coerced State; and

(b) the coercing State does so with knowledge of the circumstances of the act.

Commentary

(1) The third case of derived responsibility dealt with by Chapter IV is that of coercion of one State by another. Article 18 is concerned with the specific problem of coercion deliberately exercised in order to procure the breach of one State's obligation to a third State. In such cases the responsibility of the coercing State with respect to the third State derives not from its act of coercion, but rather from the wrongful conduct resulting from the action of the coerced State. Responsibility for the coercion itself is that of the coercing State vis-à-vis the coerced State, whereas responsibility under article 18 is the responsibility of the coercing State vis-à-vis a victim of the coerced act, in particular a third State which is injured as a result.

(2) Coercion for the purpose of article 18 has the same essential character as force majeure under article 23. Nothing less than conduct which forces the will of the coerced State will suffice, giving it no effective choice but to comply with the wishes of the coercing State. It is not sufficient that compliance with the obligation is made more difficult or onerous, or that the acting State is assisted or directed in its conduct: such questions are covered by the preceding articles. Moreover, the coercing State must coerce the very act which is internationally wrongful. It is not enough that the consequences of the coerced act merely make it more difficult for the coerced State to comply with the obligation.

(3) Though coercion for the purpose of article 18 is narrowly defined, it is not limited to unlawful coercion.[319] As a practical matter, most cases of coercion meeting the requirements of the article will be unlawful, e.g., because they involve a threat or use of force contrary to the Charter of the United Nations, or because they involve intervention, i.e. coercive interference, in the affairs of another State. Such is also the case with countermeasures. They may have a coercive character, but as is made clear in article 49, their function is to induce a wrongdoing State to comply with obligations of cessation and reparation towards the State taking the countermeasures, not to coerce that State to violate obligations to third States.[320] However, coercion could possibly take other forms, e.g. serious economic pressure, provided that it is such as to deprive the coerced State of any possibility of conforming with the obligation breached.

319 P. Reuter, Introduction au droit des traités (3rd edn.) (Paris, Presse Universitaire de France, 1995), pp. 159-161, paras. 271-274.

320 See article 49 (2) and commentary.

3080

te

an act is internationally on, be an internationally

nowledge of the circum-

by Chapter IV is that of coercion the specific problem of coercion f one State's obligation to a third tate with respect to the third State rongful conduct resulting from the n itself is that of the coercing State r article 18 is the responsibility of in particular a third State which is essential character as force majeure s the will of the coerced State will the wishes of the coercing State.

s made more difficult or onerous, nduct: such questions are covered must coerce the very act which is quences of the coerced act merely ith the obligation.

arrowly defined, it is not limited to coercion meeting the requirements
e a threat or use of force contrary involve intervention, i.e. coercive o the case with countermeasures.
r in article 49, their function is to f cessation and reparation towards at State to violate obligations to ther forms, e.g. serious economic erced State of any possibility of sse Universitaire de France, 1995),

5707

(4) The equation of coercion with force majeure means that in most cases where article 18 is applicable, the responsibility of the coerced State will be precluded vis-à-vis the injured third State. This is reflected in the phrase "but for the coercion" in paragraph (a) of article 18. Coercion amounting to force majeure may be the reason why the wrongfulness of an act is precluded vis-à-vis the coerced State. Therefore the act is not described as an internationally wrongful act in the opening clause of the article, as is done in articles 16 and 17, where no comparable circumstance would preclude the wrongfulness of the act of the assisted or controlled State. But there is no reason why the wrongfulness of that act should be precluded vis-à-vis the coercing State. On the contrary, if the coercing State cannot be held responsible for the act in question, the injured State may have no redress at all.

(5) It is a further requirement for responsibility under article 18 that the coercing State must be aware of the circumstances which would, but for the coercion, have entailed the wrongfulness of the coerced State's conduct. The reference to "circumstances" in paragraph (b) is understood as reference to the factual situation rather than to the coercing State's judgement of the legality of the act. This point is clarified by the phrase "circumstances of the act". Hence, while ignorance of the law is no excuse, ignorance of the facts is material in determining the responsibility of the coercing State.

(6) A State which sets out to procure by coercion a breach of another State's obligations to a third State will be held responsible to the third State for the consequences, regardless of whether the coercing State is also bound by the obligation in question. Otherwise, the injured State would potentially be deprived of any redress, because the acting State may be able to rely on force majeure as a circumstance precluding wrongfulness. Article 18 thus differs from articles 16 and 17 in that it does not allow for an exemption from responsibility for the act of the coerced State in circumstances where the coercing State is not itself bound by the obligation in question.

(7) State practice lends support to the principle that a State bears responsibility for the internationally wrongful conduct of another State which it coerces. In the Romano-Americana case, the claim of the United States Government in respect of the destruction of certain oil storage and other facilities owned by an American company on the orders of the Romanian Government during the First World War was originally addressed to the British Government. At the time the facilities were destroyed, Romania was at war with Germany, which was preparing to invade the country, and the United States claimed that the Romanian authorities had been "compelled" by Great Britain to take the measures in question. In support of its claim, the United States Government argued that the circumstances of the case revealed "a situation where a strong belligerent for a purpose primarily its own arising from its defensive requirements at sea, compelled a weaker Ally to acquiesce in an operation which it carried out in the territory of that Ally."[321] The British Government denied responsibility, asserting that its influence over the conduct of the Romanian authorities "did not in any way go beyond the limits of persuasion and good counsel as between governments associated in a common cause."[322] The point of disagreement between the governments of 321 Note from the United States Embassy in London, 16 February 1925, in Hackworth, Digest, vol. V, p. 702.

322 Note from the British Foreign Office dated 5 July 1928, ibid., p. 704.

3081

5708

the United States and of Great Britain was not as to the responsibility of a State for the conduct of another State which it has coerced, but rather the existence of "compulsion" in the particular circumstances of the case.[323]

323 For a different example involving the coercion of a breach of contract in circumstances amounting to a denial of justice See C.L. Bouvé, "Russia's liability in tort for Persia's breach of contract", A.J.I.L., vol. 6 (1912), p. 389.

3082

ɔ the responsibility of a State for the ther the existence of "compulsion" in of contract in circumstances amounting to a for Persia's breach of contract", A.J.I.L., vol.

5709

ARTICLE 19

Effect of this Chapter

This Chapter is without prejudice to the international responsibility, under other provisions of these articles, of the State which commits the act in question, or of any other State.

Commentary

(1) Article 19 serves three purposes. First, it preserves the responsibility of the State which has committed the internationally wrongful act, albeit with the aid or assistance, under the direction and control or subject to the coercion of another State. It recognises that the attribution of international responsibility to an assisting, directing or coercing State does not preclude the responsibility of the assisted, directed or coerced State.

(2) Second, the article makes clear that the provisions of Chapter IV are without prejudice to any other basis for establishing the responsibility of the assisting, directing or coercing State under any rule of international law defining particular conduct as wrongful. The phrase "under other provisions of these articles" is a reference, inter alia, to article 23 (force majeure), which might affect the question of responsibility. The phrase also draws attention to the fact that other provisions of the draft articles may be relevant to the State committing the act in question, and that Chapter IV in no way precludes the issue of its responsibility in that regard.

(3) Third, article 19 preserves the responsibility "of any other State" to whom the internationally wrongful conduct might also be attributable under other provisions of the Articles.

(4) Thus article 19 is intended to avoid any contrary inference in respect of responsibility which may arise from primary rules, precluding certain forms of assistance or from acts otherwise attributable to any State under Chapter II. The article covers both the implicated and the acting State. It makes it clear that Chapter IV is concerned only with situations in which the act which lies at the origin of the wrong is an act committed by one State and not by the other. If both States commit the act, then that situation would fall within the realm of co-perpetrators, dealt with in Chapter II.

3083

THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: A COMMENTARY

Volume IB

EDITORS

ANTONIO CASSESE
PAOLA GAETA
JOHN R. W. D. JONES

ADVISORY BOARD

ALBIN ESER GIORGIO GAJA PHILIPPE KIRSCH
ALAIN PELLET BERT SWART

5210

5710

3089

S711

This book has been printed digitally and produced in a standard specification in order to ensure its continuing availability

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Great Clarendon Street, Oxford OX2 6DP

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship,
and education by publishing worldwide in

Oxford New York

Auckland Cape Town Dar es Salaam Hong Kong Karachi
Kuala Lumpur Madrid Melbourne Mexico City Nairobi

Argentina Austria Brazil Chile Czech Republic France Greece
Guatemala Hungary Italy Japan South Korea Poland Portugal
Singapore Switzerland Thailand Turkey Ukraine Vietnam

Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press
in the UK and in certain other countries

Published in the United States
by Oxford University Press Inc., New York

© The various authors 2002

The moral rights of the author have been asserted

Database right Oxford University Press (maker)

Reprinted 2009

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means,
without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press,
or as expressly permitted by law, or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department,
Oxford University Press, at the address above

You must not circulate this book in any other binding or cover
And you must impose this same condition on any acquirer

ISBN 978-0-19-829862-5 (Set)
ISBN 978-0-19-924312-9 (Vol. I)
ISBN 978-0-19-925897-0 (Vol. II)
ISBN 978-0-19-825898-7 (Materials Volume)

Printed and bound in Great Britain by CPI Antony Rowe, Chippenham and Eastbourne

3085

5712

20

INDIVIDUAL CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY

Albin Eser

I. Scope of Article 25 of the ICC Statute 768
II. Elements For and Lack of a
D. Individual Responsibility (even) in the Case of Official Capacity 780

A. Within Article 25 of the ICC Statute 770
1. Individual Responsibility of Natural Persons 770
2. Perpetration and Participation 770
3. Attempt and Abandonment 771
B. Elements of Criminal Responsibility outside of Article 25 of the ICC Statute 771
1. Legality as the Basis of Criminal Responsibility 771
2. Subjective Requirements of Criminal Responsibility 771
3. Grounds for Excluding Criminal Responsibility 772
C. Missing Elements of Criminal Responsibility 773
D. Tacitly Presupposed General Requirements of Criminal Responsibility 773
III. Comparison with National and Customary International Criminal Law 774
IV. Individual Criminal Responsibility as Distinct from Other Types of Responsibility 778
A. Responsibility of Corporations 778
B. Responsibility of States 779
C. Individual Responsibility vs. Co-responsibility 779
1. The 'unitary perpetrator model' 781
2. The 'differential participation model' 782
B. Survey on Regulations of Perpetration and Participation in International Criminal Law 784
1. Early Codifications 784
2. Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind (1991/96) 785
3. ICTY/ICTR Statutes of 1993/94 786
4. The Main Features of Perpetration and Participation in the Rome Statute 786
C. Perpetration (according to Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute) 789
1. Solitary (Direct) Perpetration (Committing 'as an individual') 789
2. Co-perpetration (Committing 'jointly with another person') 789
3. Intermediary Perpetration (Committing 'through another person') 793
D. Instigation (Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute) 795
1. Accessorial to the Principal Crime 795
2. Soliciting or Inducing a Crime 796
3. Ordering a Crime 796
4. Mental Requirements with Regard to the Instigator 797

The author is greatly indebted to Alexander Schöpsdau for assistance in preparing this contribution and to Brigid Wefelnberg for her linguistic support.

3086

national laws, that the instigator anticipates the crime in its essential elements and rough outlines.[125]

5. Excess of the Perpetrator

As the instigator's scope of intent at the same time limits his responsibility, he cannot be held liable for crimes which go beyond his intent. Consequently, an excess of the principal by committing a crime which was not covered by the intent of the instigator, cannot be attributed to him. This is clearly the case in which the principal commits another crime than he was instigated to (e.g. instead of supposedly torturing a man, he rapes a woman), but also in the case that the principal does more than he was instigated to (e.g. killing the victim instead of merely injuring him). It is still irrelevant, however, when the deviation of the actual from the proposed crime is inessential.

This provision covers the 'classical' field of complicity by assistance which falls short of instigation (subparagraph (b)), on the one side, and goes beyond other contributions (such as contributing to group activities according to subparagraph (d)) on the other. In contrast to the usual language of 'aiding and abetting', used in the ICTY and ICTR Statutes,[126] the Rome Statute speaks of a person who 'aids, abets or otherwise assists' in the attempt or accomplishment of a crime, including 'providing the means for its commission'. This wording indicates that, first, aiding and abetting are no more an indistinguishable unity but that each of them has its own meaning, secondly, that aiding and abetting are just two ways of other possible forms of 'assistance', the latter thus serving as a sort of umbrella term, and thirdly, that 'providing the means' for the commission of a crime is merely a special example of assistance.

1. Objective Requirements

(a) Like instigation, complicity by assistance is also a form of accessorial liability in relation to the principal crime; this means that it must assist the accomplishment (or at least the attempt) of a crime.[127] Therefore, preparatory contributions, though determined to enable the commission of a crime, remain unpunishable if the intended principal crime is not carried out.[128] If, however, the principal crime reaches at least the stage of an attempt, it does not matter at what time and place

[125] E.g. to the German law, cf. H.-H. Jescheck and Th. Weigend, Strafrecht, Allgemeiner Teil (5th edn., 1997) 688.

[126] In Arts. 7 and 6(1) of the ICTY and ICTR Statutes, respectively 'otherwise aiding and abetting' comes after 'planning, instigating, ordering and committing'; cf. supra V.B.3.

[127] Cf. supra, V.D.1.

[128] As to the question of attempted complicity, cf. infra, VI.E.

during the preparation and performance of the crime the assistance was rendered. Although in this respect the ICTY and ICTR Statutes are clearer by explicitly speaking of aiding and abetting 'in the planning, preparation and execution' of a crime,[129] there is no reason why the assistance in certain stages of a crime should be excluded from responsibility here either.[130]

(b) The forms of contribution for facilitating the commission of the main crime are, except for 'providing the means' for its being carried out, not specified, as even the 'classical' terms of 'aiding and abetting' are far from determined.[131] If the ICTR defines aiding as 'giving assistance to someone', whereas abetting would 'involve facilitating the commission of an act by being sympathetic thereto',[132] aiding, perhaps not surprisingly, is practically identical with assisting, while abetting comes close to, if not being almost completely identifiable with, instigation.[133] Instead of exchanging synonyms, which are in any case rather unclear, it appears preferable

(c) With such a broad understanding of assistance, however, some sort of other restriction appears necessary if not even very remote involvement in or connection with the planning or performing of a crime is to be made punishable. One way of keeping complicity within certain boundaries could be the requirement of a causal connection between the assistance and the principal crime. If this requirement in terms of a 'conditio sine qua non' were taken seriously, however, complicity by assistance would not only come very close to, if not even be absorbed by, co-perpetration, but would exclude even most serious contributions in the preparation or performance of the crime from criminal responsibility if the aider were

[129] Arts. 7 and 6(1) of the ICTY and ICTR Statutes, respectively.

[130] The same view was taken by the ICTY Trial Chamber in the Tadić case when stating: 'not only does one not have to be present but the connection between the act contributing to the commission and the act of commission itself can be geographically and temporarily distanced', supra note 6, para. 687; cf. also paras. 691 f. As far as the ILC was dealing with aiding and abetting and related problems, it was merely occupied with the question of direct and/or substantial contribution, but obviously not concerned with the stage and place where it is rendered (cf. Report of the ILC, 48th Sess., supra note 5, 23 ff.). With regard to the national laws as well, even where the time of a contribution to the commission of a crime plays a role, this mainly concerns co-perpetration rather than complicity by aiding and abetting; cf., for instance, to the Spanish Código Penal which in its Art. 29 speaks of 'actos anteriores o simultáneos', Mir Puig, supra note 63, 406 ff., or to the German Strafgesetzbuch which in its § 27 simply speaks of '"Hilfeleistung" zu einer vorsätzlich begangenen rechtswidrigen Tat', cf. Cramer and Heine, in Schönke and Schröder (eds.), supra note 61, § 27 margin Nos. 13, 17.

[131] Cf., for instance, the endeavours for distinguishing between aiding and abetting and for demarcating a lower and a higher frontier by Fletcher, supra note 59, 640 ff.

[132] ICTR Trial Chamber Akayesu case, supra note 123, para. 484.

[133] This is even more evident with the common definition of abetting in terms of 'to command, procure, council, encourage, induce, or assist' in Black's Law Dictionary, supra note 116, 5. See also B. Huber, 'Alleinhandeln und Zusammenwirken aus englischer Sicht', in Eser, Huber, and Cornils, supra note 45, at 79, 84.

able to show that despite his contribution, the perpetrator would have been ready and able (as, for instance, by finding assistance by others) to perform the crime, thus negating the causality of his own contribution. Therefore, either a true causal connection between the assistance to and the commission of the crime cannot be required in principle, as seems to be the position of the ICTY when declaring as erroneous that the assistance should have a causal effect on the crime,[134] or the causal connection has to be construed in a less strict way, such as letting suffice that the aiding and abetting was at least furthering or facilitating the crime or running the risk of it being carried out.[135]

Whether one follows one or the other line of disregarding or softening the requirement of a causal connection, at some point one arrives at the question as to whether the assistance of the aider and abettor should have a certain quality in terms of a 'direct and/or substantial' contribution to the commission of the crime.

even if this is given, the causal contribution may be so minor or remote that it appears unjustified to attribute it to the accomplice. This doubt may have caused the Drafters of the Code of Crimes of 1996 to require that the aider and abettor must have 'directly and substantially' assisted in the commission of a crime.[136] And although the formulations of aiding and abetting in the ICTY and ICTR Statutes did not contain this restriction,[137] both the ICTY and the ICTR were prepared to read it into the relevant Statutes.[138] Similarly the formulation of aiding and abetting in the Rome Statute might be interpreted in the same way. Still, hopes should not be raised too high. If, for instance, a contribution has to be considered to be substantial if 'the criminal act most probably would not have occurred in the same way had not someone acted in the role that the accused in fact assumed', and if, accordingly, 'all acts of assistance by words or acts that lend encouragement or support' are thereby covered,[139] then this is nothing more than a softening of the 'classical' causality requirement by letting suffice both physical and psychological assistance in furthering the crime.[140] These reservations must not mean that the [134] ICTY Trial Chamber, Prosecutor v. Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, 10 December 1998, para. 232.

[135] Rich case law and intensive discussions on these approaches seem particularly present in Germany and Spain: cf., for instance, Cramer and Heine, in Schönke and Schröder (eds.), supra note 61, § 27 margin No. 7 ff., and Mir Puig, supra note 63, 410 respectively.

[136] Art. 2(3)(d) of Draft Code 1996; cf. supra, V.B.2 at note 75.

[137] Cf. supra, V.B.3.

[138] Cf. the ICTY Trial Chamber in the Tadić case, supra note 6, para. 691, confirmed in the Čelebići decision, Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, 16 November 1998, para. 329. Basically on the same lines the ICTY Trial Chamber in the Furundžija case, supra note 134, para. 232, as well as the ICTR Trial Chamber in the Akayesu case, supra note 123, para. 484, and in Prosecutor v. Kayishema and Ruzindana, ICTR-95-1-T, 21 May 1999, paras. 199 f.

[139] ICTY Trial Chamber in the Tadić case, supra note 6, para. 689.

[140] For a closer analysis of the ICTY/ICTR judgments, see Ambos, in Triffterer, supra note 7, Art. 25 margin Nos. 15 ff.

requirement of a 'substantial' contribution is completely futile; for although not providing clear delineations, it can function as a sort of monitor by which, for instance, casual remarks, though perceived by the principal as encouragement, are obviously irrelevant, because easily exchangeable, and can thus be excluded. What this means in practice, however, is hardly definable in an abstract formula but has to be realized in a case-by-case method whereby certain modern theories of (positive and negative) imputation and attribution might be helpful when taken into consideration.[141]

2. Subjective Requirements

Unlike instigation, which is governed by the ordinary requirements of the mental element according to Article 30 of the ICC Statute,[142] complicity by way of aiding, abetting, or otherwise assisting requires two different forms of mens rea.

(a) With regard to facilitating the commission of the crime, the aider and abettor must act with 'purpose' (Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute). This means more than the mere knowledge that the accomplice aids the commission of the offence, as would suffice for complicity according to the ICTR and ICTY Statutes,[143] rather he must know as well as wish that his assistance shall facilitate the commission of the crime. Consequently, if a civilian, asked by a soldier to disclose the hiding place of the later victim, is doing so out of fear and with the hope that the victim may have fled, he will not be criminally responsible, even if he is aware that the soldier might find and kill the victim.

(b) With regard to all other elements as his own assistance as well as the principal's crime, the same mental elements are required and sufficient as with instigation. Correspondingly, the aider and abettor must have 'double intent' both with regard to the intentional commission by the principal and the requisite elements of his assistance.[144] In sum, while the objective requirements of aiding, abetting, and assisting are relatively low, the criminal responsibility of aiders and abettors contains certain restrictions by means of higher subjective requirements.[145]

[141] To the same end, see Ambos, in Triffterer, supra note 7, margin No. 18 and A. Serini, 'Individual Criminal Responsibility', in F. Lattanzi (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Comments on the Draft Statute (1998) 140. On the various theories of the foundation and exclusion of imputation and attribution, see most recently Th. Lenckner, in Schönke and Schröder (eds.), supra note 61, § 13 pre-notes 71–102 and, in particular on participation, Cramer and Heine, in Schönke and Schröder (eds.), supra note 61, § 27 margin No. 9a, 10a.

[142] Cf. supra, V.D.4.

[143] According to Arts. 7 and (1) of the ICTR and ICTY Statutes; cf. the judgments by the ICTY Trial Chamber in the Furundžija case, supra note 134, para. 249; cf. also ICTY Trial Chamber in the Tadić case, supra note 6, para. 692 and ICTR Trial Chamber in the Akayesu case, supra note 123, para. 479, and furthermore the critical analysis by Ambos, supra note 38, 789 ff.

[144] Cf. supra, V.D.4.

[145] This is also the conclusion by Ambos, in Triffterer, supra note 7, margin No. 19.

S-17

BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY

NINTH EDITION

BRYAN A. GARNER
EDITOR IN CHIEF

5718

Black's Law Dictionary®

Ninth Edition

Bryan A. Garner
Editor in Chief

Special Tribunal for Lebanon
1148
Legal Library

WEST®
A Thomson Reuters business

Mat #40776543
Mat #40776546—deluxe

3092

5719

de libera piscaria (dee lib-ər-ə pi-skair-ee-ə), n. [Law Latin "of free fishery"] Hist. A writ allowing an exclusive right to fish on public navigable water. • This was a form of quod permittat.

deliberate (di-lib-[ə]-rit), adj. (15c) 1. Intentional; premeditated; fully considered. 2. Unimpulsive; slow in deciding.

deliberate (di-lib-ə-rate), vb. (Of a court, jury, etc.) to weigh and analyze all the evidence after closing arguments <the jury deliberated for 12 hours before reaching a verdict>.

deliberate elicitation. (1966) Criminal procedure. The purposeful yet covert drawing forth of an incriminating response (usu. not during a formal interrogation) from a suspect whose Sixth Amendment right to counsel has attached but who has not waived that right. • Deliberate elicitation may occur, for example, when a police officer engages an arrested suspect in conversation on the way to the police station. Deliberate elicitation violates the Sixth Amendment. Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201, 84 S.Ct. 1199 (1964). See MASSIAH RULE.

deliberate indifference. See INDIFFERENCE.

deliberate-indifference instruction. See JEWELL INSTRUCTION.

deliberate speed, with all. (1817) As quickly as the maintenance of law and order and the welfare of the people will allow, esp. with respect to the desegregation of public schools. Brown v. Board of Educ., 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686 (1954). [Cases: Schools ⇨13(9).]

deliberation, n. (14c) The act of carefully considering issues and options before making a decision or taking some action; esp., the process by which a jury reaches a verdict, as by analyzing, discussing, and weighing the evidence. See CONSIDERATION (3). [Cases: Criminal Law ⇨857(1); Federal Civil Procedure ⇨1974; Trial ⇨306.] — deliberate (di-lib-ə-rayt), vb.

deliberative assembly. See ASSEMBLY.

deliberative-process privilege. (1977) The principle that a decision-maker's thoughts and how they led to a decision are not subject to revelation or scrutiny. See U.S. v. Morgan, 313 U.S. 409, 61 S.Ct. 999 (1941). • An exception to the rule may be allowed if a party can clearly show that the decision resulted from bias, bad faith, misconduct, or illegal or unlawful action. The privilege is meant to encourage open and independent discussion among those who develop government policy. [Cases: Privileged Communications and Confidentiality ⇨361.] — Also termed mental-process privilege.

de libero homine exhibendo (dee lib-ər-oh hom-ə-nee ek-si-ben-doh). [Latin "for the production of a free man"] Roman law. An interdict requiring a free person to be produced before a magistrate.

de libero passagio (dee lib-ər-oh pə-say-jee-oh), n. [Law Latin "of free passage"] Hist. A writ allowing free passage over water. • This was a form of quod permittat.

de libertate probanda (dee lib-ər-tay-tee proh-ban-də), n. [Law Latin "for proving liberty"] Hist. A writ directing a sheriff to take security from a person accused of being a villein and to protect that person from harassment until the person's status was determined by the justices of assize.

de libertatibus allocandis (dee lib-ər-tay-tə-bəs al-ə-kan-dis), n. [Law Latin "for allowing liberties"] Hist. A writ allowing a person entitled to certain liberties to obtain them.

de licentia transfretandi (dee lī-sen-shee-ə trans-frə-tan-dī), n. [Law Latin "of permission to cross the sea"] Hist. A writ ordering wardens of seaports, on certain conditions, to permit any person named in the writ to cross the sea.

delict (di-likt), n. [Latin delictum "an offense"] (16c) Roman & civil law. A violation of the law; esp., a wrongful act or omission giving rise to a claim for compensation; TORT. — Also termed (in Roman law) delictum; (in French law) délit. [Cases: Torts ⇨107.]

> "A delict is a civil wrong. It is an infringement of another's interests that is wrongful irrespective of any prior contractual undertaking to refrain from it — though there may also be one. It entitles the injured party to claim compensation in civil proceedings — though criminal proceedings aimed at punishing the wrongdoer may also ensue." 1 P.Q.R. Boberg, The Law of Delict 1 (1984).

private delict. A wrong regarded primarily as a matter of compensation between individuals.

public delict. A wrong for which the community as a whole takes steps to punish the offender. Cf. public tort under TORT.

quasi-delict. 1. Roman law. A residuary category of private wrongs, characterized by either vicarious or strict liability.

> "QUASI-DELICT . . . . Justinian enumerates four cases of obligations said to arise quasi ex delicto. The implication seems to be that in all of them the law creates a liability though the defendant may not in fact be to blame. The cases are the following: — (1) The judge who 'makes the case his own' . . . incurs a penalty fixed by the magistrate at discretion . . . . (2) If anything was thrown, or poured, from an upper room . . . the occupier was liable for double the damage . . . . (3) If a thing was kept placed or suspended over a way used by the public . . . there was a penalty . . . which might be recovered from the occupier . . . . (4) Shipowners, innkeepers and stable-keepers were liable for damage or theft committed by slaves or free persons in their employ . . . ." R.W. Lee, The Elements of Roman Law 401-02 (4th ed. 1956).

2. See quasi-offense under OFFENSE (2). 3. Scots law. Tortious conduct that is negligent, as opposed to intentional.

delictal, See DELICTUAL.

deliction (di-lik-shən). (1966) The loss of land by gradual, natural changes, such as erosion resulting from a change in the course of a river or stream. Cf. ACCRETION (1); ALLUVION; AVULSION (2); EROSION. [Cases

3095

Halsbury's Laws of Hong Kong - Commentary
Copyright 2011 LexisNexis Hong Kong, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc

 The law is stated as at 1 November 2010 - Current Service Issue No. 51 ***

[130] CRIMINAL LAW
(1) THE NATURE OF CRIME
(ii) Specific States of Mind(a) In General

HLHK CRIMINAL LAW 55

[130.055] Secondary parties

A person who aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission of an offence by any other person is guilty of that offence and is liable to be tried and punished as a principal offender n1. In the language of the law appropriate when the distinction between felony and misdemeanour was relevant, such a person who aided and abetted would, in relation to a felony, be described as a principal in the second degree n2. The words aid, abet, counsel or procure are used in their ordinary meaning and are not terms of art n3. In order to determine whether an offence has been committed it is preferable to consider the phrase as a whole n4. As a general rule, any offence can be aided and abetted unless there is something in the legislation creating the offence which expressly or impliedly negatives the liability of secondary parties n5.

An aider and abettor must be present when the crime is committed either actually or constructively n6. However, mere presence is not enough and there must be a common purpose between the principal and the aider and abettor and an intention to aid or encourage the persons who commit the offence or, a readiness to aid and encourage them if required n7. Presence coupled with a secret intention to assist is insufficient and there must be some act of encouragement or assistance given to the principal either, before or at the time of the commission of the offence, with the intention of furthering its commission n8. The accused is liable as a secondary party even though he takes no part in the actual perpetration of the offence n9. A person may be guilty as an aider and abettor if, with the relevant mens rea, he fails to act when under a duty to do so n10.

Where it is alleged that the accused procured the offence, the prosecution must prove a causal connection between the act constituting the procurement and the crime although it is not necessary to establish that the offence was committed in the manner it was procured n11. In relation to counselling it must be proved that the offence counselled was in fact committed n12. However, it is not necessary to show that the counselling was the substantial cause of the commission of the offence but, in such a case it must be proved that the person counselled committed the offence and was at the time of the commission of the offence acting within the scope of his authority and that the crime was not accidental n13.

It is not necessary to establish that the principal committed the exact offence that was counselled and the accessory is liable as long as the offence is substantially that which he counselled n14. A person may be guilty as a counsellor or procurer if he simply sets the stage for the offence n15. Procuring means to produce by endeavour in the sense that the accused sets out to see that a thing happens and takes steps to produce that outcome n16. A person who counsels or procures a crime may escape liability as a secondary party if before the offence is committed he countermands or nullifies his orders n17. Mere repentance or withdrawal is insufficient n18. What is required to escape liability is an express, timely and actual countermand and revocation of the counselling or procuring previously given or undertaken n19.

n1 Criminal Procedure Ordinance (Cap 221) s 89. This provision is essentially procedural: R v Wong Hoi [1966] HKLR 386; see also [130.684] note 47.

n2 R v Towle (1816) 3 Price 145, 146 ER 217, Ex Ch. As to principals in the first degree see [130.054].

n3 A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1975) [1975] QB 773, [1975] 2 All ER 684, CA (Eng).

n4 A-G v Able [1984] QB 795, [1984] 1 All ER 277.

n5 See Mok Wei-tak v R [1986] HKLR 1054, CA; R v Jefferson (1994) 99 Cr App Rep 13, CA (Eng).

n6 R v Towle (1816) Russ & Ry 314; R v Kwan Kwok-hing [1977] HKLR 159.

n7 1 Hale PC 439; R v Coney (1882) 8 QBD 534, CCR; Du Cros v Lambourne [1907] 1 KB 40, DC (Eng); R v Baldessare (1930) 22 Cr App Rep 70, 144 LT 185, CCA; Sayce v Coupe [1953] 1 QB 1, [1952] 2 All ER 715, DC; R v Wong Hoi [1966] HKLR 386; R v Clarkson (1971) 55 Cr App Rep 445 (followed in) R v Leung Tak-yin [1987] 2 HKC 250; R v Lam Kit [1988] HKC 679; R v Keung Hing- cheung (unreported; Crim App 198/1990), CA. However, presence may be some evidence from which encouragement and the relevant mens rea might be inferred: R v Baldessare (1930) 22 Cr App Rep 70, 144 LT 185; Wilcox v Jeffrey [1951] 1 All ER 464, DC (Eng); R v Chu Hak-kim (unreported; Crim App 95/1985).

n8 Du Cros v Lambourne [1907] 1 KB 40, DC (Eng); Rubie v Faulkner [1940] 1 KB 571, DC (Eng); R v Kwan Kwok-hing [1977] HKLR 159; Tuck v Robson [1970] 1 All ER 1171, [1970] 1 WLR 741, DC (Eng); R v Lau Chi-kin [1988] 1 HKLR 282; R v Giannetto [1997] 1 Cr App Rep 1, CA (Eng).

n9 R v Towle (1816) Russ & Ry 314.

n10 Rubie v Faulkner [1940] 1 KB 571, [1940] 1 All ER 285, DC (Eng).

n11 A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1975) [1975] QB 773, [1975] 2 All ER 684, CA (Eng); A-G v Able [1984] QB 795, [1984] 1 All ER 277; R v Szeto Kwok-hei [1991] 2 HKLR 178, CA.

n12 R v Gregory (1867) LR 1 CCR 77.

n13 R v Calhaem [1985] QB 808, CA (Eng); A-G v Able [1984] QB 795, [1984] 1 All ER 277.

n14 R v Bainbridge [1960] 1 QB 129, [1959] 3 All ER 200, CA (Eng); A-G v Able [1984] QB 795, [1984] 1 All ER 277.

n15 Thambiah v R [1966] AC 37, [1965] 3 All ER 661, PC.

n16 A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1975) [1975] QB 773, [1975] 2 All ER 684, CA (Eng). See also R v Broadfoot [1977] 3 All ER 753, 64 Cr App Rep 71, CA (Eng).

n17 1 Hale PC 618; R v Croft [1944] KB 295, [1944] 2 All ER 483, CCA.

n18 R v Fletcher [1962] Crim LR 551, CCA.

n19 R v Croft [1944] KB 295, [1944] 2 All ER 483, CCA; R v Beccera, R v Cooper (1976) 62 Cr App Rep 212, CA (Eng); R v Whitefield (1983) 79 Cr App Rep 36, CA (Eng); R v Rook (1993) 97 Cr App Rep 327, CA (Eng).

5722

Customary International Humanitarian Law

Volume I: Rules

JEAN-MARIE HENCKAERTS AND LOUISE DOSWALD-BECK

ICRC

CAMBRIDGE

3096

5723

PUBLISHED BY THE PRESS SYNDICATE OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE
The Pitt Building, Trumpington Street, Cambridge, United Kingdom

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS
The Edinburgh Building, Cambridge, CB2 2RU, UK
40 West 20th Street, New York, NY 10011–4211, USA
477 Williamstown Road, Port Melbourne, VIC 3207, Australia
Ruiz de Alarcón 13, 28014 Madrid, Spain
Dock House, The Waterfront, Cape Town 8001, South Africa

http://www.cambridge.org

© International Committee of the Red Cross 2005

This book is in copyright. Subject to statutory exception and to the provisions of relevant collective licensing agreements, no reproduction of any part may take place without the written permission of Cambridge University Press.

First published 2005

Printed in the United Kingdom at the University Press, Cambridge

Typeface Trump Medieval 10/13 pt. System LaTeX 2$_\varepsilon$ [TB]

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

ISBN 0 521 80899 5 hardback
ISBN 0 521 00528 0 paperback

Hardback also available as:
ISBN 0 521 53925 0 set including Volume II

Part I

Chapter

Chapter

Chapter

Chapter

Chapter

Chapter

Part II

Chapter

Chapter

Chapter

Chapter

Chapter

Chapter

3097

5724

CHAPTER 34

THE WOUNDED, SICK AND SHIPWRECKED

Rule 109. Whenever circumstances permit, and particularly after an engagement, each party to the conflict must, without delay, take all possible measures to search for, collect and evacuate the wounded, sick and shipwrecked without adverse distinction.

Practice

Volume II, Chapter 34, Section A.

Summary

State practice establishes this rule as a norm of customary international law applicable in both international and non-international armed conflicts.

International armed conflicts

The duty to collect wounded and sick combatants without distinction in international armed conflicts was first codified in the 1864 Geneva Convention.[1] This subject is dealt with in more detail in the 1949 Geneva Conventions.[2] This duty is now codified in Article 10 of Additional Protocol I,[3] albeit in more general terms of "protecting" the wounded, sick and shipwrecked, which means "coming to their defence, lending help and support".[4]

The numerous military manuals which contain this rule are phrased in general terms covering all wounded, sick and shipwrecked, whether military or civilian.[5] Sweden's IHL Manual, in particular, identifies Article 10 of

[1] 1864 Geneva Convention, Article 6 (cited in Vol. II, Ch. 34, § 1).
[2] First Geneva Convention, Article 15, first paragraph (ibid., § 5); Second Geneva Convention, Article 18, first paragraph (ibid., § 7); Fourth Geneva Convention, Article 16, second paragraph (ibid., § 10).
[3] Additional Protocol I, Article 10 (adopted by consensus) (ibid., § 199).
[4] Yves Sandoz, Christophe Swinarski, Bruno Zimmermann (eds.), Commentary on the Additional Protocols, ICRC, Geneva, 1987, § 446.
[5] See, e.g., the military manuals of Argentina (cited in Vol. II, Ch. 34, §§ 21–22 and 127), Australia (ibid., §§ 23 and 128–129), Belgium (ibid., §§ 24–25 and 130), Benin (ibid., §§ 26 and 131), Burkina Faso (ibid., § 27), Cameroon (ibid., §§ 28–29 and 134), Canada (ibid., §§ 30–31 and 133), Colombia (ibid., §§ 32–35), Congo (ibid., § 36), Croatia (ibid., §§ 37–40 and 135), Dominican Republic (ibid., § 136), Ecuador (ibid., §§ 41 and 137), France (ibid., §§ 42–43 and 138), Germany

3098

Additional Protocol I as a codification of customary international law.[6] The legislation of many States provides for the punishment of persons who abandon the wounded, sick and shipwrecked.[7]

Non-international armed conflicts

In the context of non-international armed conflicts, this rule is based on common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which provides that "the wounded and sick shall be collected".[8] It is codified in a more detailed manner in Additional Protocol II.[9] In addition, it is set forth in a number of other instruments pertaining also to non-international armed conflicts.[10]

The duty to search for, collect and evacuate the wounded, sick and shipwrecked is contained in a number of military manuals which are applicable in or have been applied in non-international armed conflicts.[11] It is an offence under the legislation of several States to abandon the wounded and sick.[12]

(ibid., § 44), Hungary (ibid., §§ 45 and 139), India (ibid., § 140), Indonesia (ibid., § 46), Italy (ibid., §§ 47 and 141), Kenya (ibid., §§ 48 and 142), Lebanon (ibid., § 49), Madagascar (ibid., §§ 50 and 143), Mali (ibid., § 51), Morocco (ibid., § 52), Netherlands (ibid., §§ 53–55 and 144), New Zealand (ibid., §§ 56 and 145), Nigeria (ibid., §§ 58–60 and 146), Philippines (ibid., §§ 61 and 147–149), Romania (ibid., §§ 62 and 150), Rwanda (ibid., § 151), Senegal (ibid., § 64), Spain (ibid., §§ 66 and 153), Switzerland (ibid., §§ 68 and 154), Togo (ibid., §§ 69 and 155), United Kingdom (ibid., §§ 70–71 and 156–157), United States (ibid., §§ 72–74 and 158–161) and Yugoslavia (ibid., §§ 75 and 162).

6 Sweden, IHL Manual (1991), Section 2.2.3, p. 18.

7 See, e.g., the legislation of China (cited in Vol. II, Ch. 34, § 80), Colombia (ibid., § 81), Democratic Republic of the Congo (ibid., § 82), Iraq (ibid., § 84), Italy (ibid., § 86), Nicaragua (ibid., § 87), Spain (ibid., § 90), Uruguay (ibid., § 93), Venezuela (ibid., § 94) and Vietnam (ibid., § 95); see also the draft legislation of Argentina (ibid., § 76), El Salvador (ibid., § 83) and Nicaragua (ibid., § 88).

8 Geneva Conventions, common Article 3 (ibid., § 3).

9 Additional Protocol II, Article 8 (adopted by consensus) (ibid., § 13).

10 See, e.g., Memorandum of Understanding on the Application of IHL between Croatia and the SFRY, para. 1 (ibid., § 16); Agreement on the Application of IHL between the Parties to the Conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, para. 2.1 (ibid., § 18); Hague Statement on Respect for Humanitarian Principles (ibid., § 17); Comprehensive Agreement on Respect for Human Rights and International Humanitarian Law in the Philippines, Part IV, Article 4(2) and (9) (ibid., § 19).

11 See, e.g., the military manuals of Argentina (ibid., § 22), Australia (ibid., §§ 23 and 128), Belgium (ibid., § 24), Benin (ibid., §§ 26 and 131), Cameroon (ibid., § 29), Canada (ibid., §§ 30–31 and 133), Colombia (ibid., §§ 32–35), Croatia (ibid., §§ 37–40 and 135), Ecuador (ibid., §§ 41 and 137), Germany (ibid., § 44), Hungary (ibid., § 45), India (ibid., § 140), Italy (ibid., §§ 47 and 141), Kenya (ibid., §§ 48 and 142), Lebanon (ibid., § 49), Madagascar (ibid., §§ 50 and 143), Netherlands (ibid., §§ 53–54), New Zealand (ibid., § 56), Nicaragua (ibid., § 57), Nigeria (ibid., §§ 58 and 60), Philippines (ibid., §§ 61 and 147–149), Rwanda (ibid., § 151), Senegal (ibid., § 65), Spain (ibid., § 66), Togo (ibid., §§ 69 and 155), United Kingdom (ibid., §§ 70–71), United States (ibid., §§ 72–73) and Yugoslavia (ibid., §§ 75 and 162).

12 See, e.g., the legislation of Colombia (ibid., § 81), Democratic Republic of the Congo (ibid., § 82), Nicaragua (ibid., § 87), Venezuela (ibid., § 94) and Vietnam (ibid., § 95); see also the legislation of Italy (ibid., § 86) and Uruguay (ibid., § 93), the application of which is not excluded in time of non-international armed conflict, and the draft legislation of Argentina (ibid., § 76), El Salvador (ibid., § 83) and Nicaragua (ibid., § 88).

5726

No official contrary practice was found with respect to either international or non-international armed conflicts. The ICRC has called on parties to both international and non-international armed conflicts to respect this rule.[13]

Interpretation

The obligation to search for, collect and evacuate the wounded, sick and shipwrecked is an obligation of means. Each party to the conflict has to take all possible measures to search for, collect and evacuate the wounded, sick and shipwrecked. This includes permitting humanitarian organisations to assist in their search and collection. Practice shows that the ICRC in particular has engaged in the evacuation of the wounded and sick.[14] It is clear that in practice humanitarian organisations will need permission from the party in control of a certain area to carry out such activities, but such permission must not be denied arbitrarily (see also commentary to Rule 55). The UN Security Council, UN General Assembly and UN Commission on Human Rights have called upon the parties to the conflicts in El Salvador and Lebanon to permit the ICRC to evacuate the wounded and sick.[15]

In addition, the possibility of calling upon the civilian population to assist in the search, collection and evacuation of the wounded, sick and shipwrecked is recognised in the Geneva Conventions and their Additional Protocols.[16] It is also provided for in several military manuals.[17] Article 18 of the First Geneva Convention provides that "no one may ever be molested or convicted for having nursed the wounded or sick".[18] This principle is also set forth in Article 17(1) of Additional Protocol I, to which no reservations have been made.[19]

The Geneva Conventions and other instruments, such as the UN Secretary-General's Bulletin on observance by United Nations forces of international [13] See, e.g., ICRC, Conflict between Iraq and Iran: ICRC Appeal (ibid., § 110), Memorandum on the Applicability of International Humanitarian Law (ibid., § 111), Communication to the Press No. 93/17 (ibid., § 112), Memorandum on Respect for International Humanitarian Law in Angola (ibid., § 113), Memorandum on Compliance with International Humanitarian Law by the Forces Participating in Operation Turquoise (ibid., § 114) and Communication to the Press No. 00/42 (ibid., § 115).

[14] See, e.g., the practice of the ICRC (ibid., § 185) and Communication to the Press No. 96/25 (ibid., § 189).

[15] UN Security Council, Res. 436 (ibid., § 173); UN General Assembly, Res. 40/139 (ibid., § 174); UN Commission on Human Rights, Res. 1986/39 (ibid., § 175).

[16] First Geneva Convention, Article 18 (ibid., § 6); Second Geneva Convention, Article 21, first paragraph (ibid., § 8); Additional Protocol I, Article 17(2) (adopted by consensus) (ibid., § 11); Additional Protocol II, Article 18(1) (adopted by consensus) (ibid., § 14).

[17] See, e.g., the military manuals of Argentina (ibid., § 21), Cameroon (ibid., § 29), Canada (ibid., §§ 30–31), Germany (ibid., § 44), Kenya (ibid., § 48), New Zealand (ibid., § 56), Russia (ibid., § 63), Switzerland (ibid., § 68), United Kingdom (ibid., §§ 70–71), United States (ibid., § 72) and Yugoslavia (ibid., § 75).

[18] First Geneva Convention, Article 18 (cited in Vol. II, Ch. 7, § 2.31).

[19] Additional Protocol I, Article 17(1) (adopted by consensus).

3100

5727

humanitarian law, state that cease-fires and other local arrangements are seen as appropriate ways to create the conditions in which the wounded and sick can be evacuated and require the parties to the conflict to conclude such agreements, whenever circumstances permit, to remove, exchange and transport the wounded from the battlefield.[20] Many military manuals make the same point.[21]

Scope of application

This rule applies to all wounded, sick and shipwrecked, without adverse distinction (see Rule 88). This means that it applies to the wounded, sick and shipwrecked regardless to which party they belong, but also regardless of whether or not they have taken a direct part in hostilities. The application of this rule to civilians was already the case pursuant to Article 16 of the Fourth Geneva Convention, which applies to the whole of the populations of the countries in conflict, and is repeated in Article 10 of Additional Protocol I.[22] With respect to non-international armed conflicts, common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions applies to all persons taking no active part in the hostilities, which includes civilians.[23] In addition, Article 8 of Additional Protocol II does not indicate any distinction (see also Article 2(1) of Additional Protocol II on non-discrimination).[24] Most military manuals state this rule in general terms.[25]

[20] First Geneva Convention, Article 15, second and third paragraphs (cited in Vol. II, Ch. 34, § 118); Second Geneva Convention, Article 18, second paragraph (ibid., § 119); Fourth Geneva Convention, Article 17 (ibid., § 120); UN Secretary-General's Bulletin, Section 9.2 (ibid., § 126).

[21] See, e.g., the military manuals of Argentina (ibid., § 127), Australia (ibid., §§ 128–129), Cameroon (ibid., § 134), Canada (ibid., §§ 132–133), Ecuador (ibid., § 137), France (ibid., § 138), India (ibid., § 140), Kenya (ibid., § 142), Madagascar (ibid., § 143), Netherlands (ibid., § 144), New Zealand (ibid., § 145), Nigeria (ibid., § 146), Senegal (ibid., § 152), Spain (ibid., § 153), Switzerland (ibid., § 154), United Kingdom (ibid., §§ 156–157), United States (ibid., §§ 158–159 and 161) and Yugoslavia (ibid., § 162).

[22] Fourth Geneva Convention, Article 16 (ibid., §§ 10 and 198); Additional Protocol I, Article 10 (adopted by consensus) (ibid., §§ 199 and 346).

[23] Geneva Conventions, common Article 3 (ibid., § 3).

[24] Additional Protocol II, Article 8 (adopted by consensus) (ibid., § 13) and Article 2(1) (adopted by consensus) (cited in Vol. II, Ch. 32, § 369).

[25] See, e.g., the military manuals of Argentina (cited in Vol. II, Ch. 34, §§ 21–22 and 127), Australia (ibid., §§ 23 and 128–129), Belgium (ibid., §§ 24–25 and 130), Benin (ibid., §§ 26 and 131), Burkina Faso (ibid., § 27), Cameroon (ibid., §§ 28–29 and 134), Canada (ibid., §§ 30–31 and 132–133), Colombia (ibid., §§ 32–35), Congo (ibid., § 36), Croatia (ibid., §§ 37–40 and 135), Dominican Republic (ibid., § 136), Ecuador (ibid., §§ 41 and 137), France (ibid., §§ 42–43 and 138), Germany (ibid., § 44), Hungary (ibid., §§ 45 and 139), India (ibid., § 140), Indonesia (ibid., § 46), Italy (ibid., §§ 47 and 141), Kenya (ibid., §§ 48 and 142), Lebanon (ibid., § 49), Madagascar (ibid., §§ 50 and 143), Mali (ibid., § 51), Morocco (ibid., § 52), Netherlands (ibid., §§ 53–55 and 144), New Zealand (ibid., §§ 56 and 145), Nigeria (ibid., §§ 58–60 and 146), Philippines (ibid., §§ 61 and 147–149), Romania (ibid., §§ 62 and 150), Rwanda (ibid., § 151), Senegal (ibid., § 64), Spain (ibid., §§ 66 and 153), Switzerland (ibid., §§ 68 and 154), Togo (ibid., §§ 69 and 155), United Kingdom (ibid., §§ 70–71 and 156–157), United States (ibid., §§ 72–74 and 158–161) and Yugoslavia (ibid., §§ 75 and 162).

3101

5728

Rule 110. The wounded, sick and shipwrecked must receive, to the fullest extent practicable and with the least possible delay, the medical care and attention required by their condition. No distinction may be made among them founded on any grounds other than medical ones.

Practice

Volume II, Chapter 34, Section B.

Summary

State practice establishes this rule as a norm of customary international law applicable in both international and non-international armed conflicts.

International armed conflicts

The duty to care for wounded and sick combatants without distinction is a long-standing rule of customary international law already recognised in the Lieber Code and codified in the 1864 Geneva Convention.[26] This subject is dealt with in more detail by the 1949 Geneva Conventions.[27] It is codified in Article 10 of Additional Protocol I.[28]

The numerous military manuals which contain this rule are phrased in general terms covering all wounded, sick and shipwrecked.[29] Sweden's IHL Manual, in particular, identifies Article 10 of Additional Protocol I as a codification of customary international law.[30] To deny medical care to the wounded, sick and shipwrecked is an offence under the legislation of many States.[31]

[26] Lieber Code, Article 79 (ibid., § 205); 1864 Geneva Convention, Article 6 (ibid., § 191).

[27] First Geneva Convention, Article 12, second paragraph, and Article 15, first paragraph (ibid., §§ 193–194); Second Geneva Convention, Article 12, second paragraph, and Article 18, first paragraph (ibid., §§ 193 and 196); Fourth Geneva Convention, Article 16, first paragraph (ibid., § 198).

[28] Additional Protocol I, Article 10 (adopted by consensus) (ibid., §§ 199 and 346).

[29] See, e.g., the military manuals of Argentina (ibid., §§ 215 and 355), Australia (ibid., §§ 216–217 and 357), Belgium (ibid., §§ 218–219), Benin (ibid., §§ 220 and 359), Bosnia and Herzegovina (ibid., § 221), Burkina Faso (ibid., § 222), Cameroon (ibid., §§ 223–224), Canada (ibid., §§ 225–226), Colombia (ibid., §§ 227–229), Congo (ibid., § 230), Croatia (ibid., §§ 231 and 233), Ecuador (ibid., § 234), El Salvador (ibid., § 235), France (ibid., §§ 236–238), Germany (ibid., §§ 239–240), Hungary (ibid., § 241), India (ibid., § 243), Indonesia (ibid., § 244), Israel (ibid., § 245), Italy (ibid., § 246), Kenya (ibid., §§ 247 and 367), Lebanon (ibid., § 248), Madagascar (ibid., §§ 249 and 368), Mali (ibid., § 250), Morocco (ibid., § 251), Netherlands (ibid., §§ 252–254 and 370), New Zealand (ibid., §§ 255 and 371), Nicaragua (ibid., § 256), Nigeria (ibid., §§ 257–260), Philippines (ibid., §§ 261–264 and 374), Romania (ibid., § 375), Rwanda (ibid., § 267), Senegal (ibid., § 268), South Africa (ibid., § 269), Spain (ibid., § 270), Sweden (ibid., §§ 271–272), Switzerland (ibid., §§ [illegible] and 379), Togo (ibid., §§ 274 and 380), Uganda (ibid., § 275), United Kingdom (ibid., §§ 276–[illegible] and United States (ibid., §§ 278–281).

[30] Sweden, IHL Manual (ibid., § 272).

[31] See, e.g., the legislation of Azerbaijan (ibid., § 283), Bangladesh (ibid., § 284), China (ibid., § 285), Colombia (ibid., § 286), Cuba (ibid., § 287), Czech Republic (ibid., § 288), Estonia (ibid., § 289), Ireland (ibid., § 291), Norway (ibid., § 292), Slovakia (ibid., § 293), Spain (ibid., § 294), Ukraine (ibid., § 295), Uruguay (ibid., § 296), Venezuela (ibid., § 297) and Vietnam (ibid., § 298); see also the draft legislation of Argentina (ibid., § 282) and El Salvador (ibid., § 289).

3102

5729

Non-international armed conflicts

In the context of a non-international armed conflict, this rule is based on common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which provides that "the wounded and sick shall be collected and cared for".[32] It is codified in a more detailed manner in Additional Protocol II.[33] In addition, it is set forth in a number of other instruments pertaining also to non-international armed conflicts.[34]

The duty to care for wounded and sick combatants without distinction is set forth in a number of military manuals which are applicable in or have been applied in non-international armed conflicts.[35] Under the legislation of many States, it is an offence to deny medical care to the wounded, sick and shipwrecked.[36] Respect for this rule was required by Argentina's National Court of Appeals in the Military Junta case in 1985.[37] Furthermore, there are official statements and other practice supporting this rule in the context of non-international armed conflicts.[38]

No official contrary practice was found with respect to either international or non-international armed conflicts. States and international organisations have generally condemned violations of this rule.[39] The ICRC has called on

[redacted]

[32] Geneva Conventions, common Article 3 (ibid., § 192).

[33] Additional Protocol II, Articles 7–8 (adopted by consensus) (ibid., §§ 201–202).

[34] Cairo Declaration on Human Rights in Islam, Article 3(a) (ibid., § 208); Hague Statement on Respect for Humanitarian Principles, paras. 1 and 2 (ibid., § 209); Memorandum of Understanding on the Application of International Humanitarian Law between Croatia and the SFRY, para. 1 (ibid., §§ 210 and 351); Agreement on the Application of International Humanitarian Law between the Parties to the Conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, para. 2.1 (ibid., §§ 211 and 352); Comprehensive Agreement on Respect for Human Rights and International Humanitarian Law in the Philippines, Part IV, Article 4(2) and (9) (ibid., § 212).

[35] See, e.g., the military manuals of Argentina (ibid., §§ 215 and 355), Australia (ibid., §§ 216–217 and 357), Belgium (ibid., § 218), Benin (ibid., §§ 220 and 359), Bosnia and Herzegovina (ibid., § 221), Cameroon (ibid., § 224), Canada (ibid., §§ 225–226), Colombia (ibid., §§ 227–229), Croatia (ibid., §§ 231 and 233), Ecuador (ibid., § 234), El Salvador (ibid., § 235), Germany (ibid., §§ 239–240), India (ibid., §§ 242–243), Italy (ibid., § 246), Kenya (ibid., §§ 247 and 367), Lebanon (ibid., § 248), Madagascar (ibid., §§ 249 and 368), Netherlands (ibid., §§ 252–253 and 369), New Zealand (ibid., § 255), Nicaragua (ibid., § 256), Nigeria (ibid., §§ 257–258 and 260), Philippines (ibid., §§ 261–264 and 374), Rwanda (ibid., § 267), South Africa (ibid., § 269), Spain (ibid., § 270), Sweden (ibid., § 271), Togo (ibid., §§ 274 and 380), Uganda (ibid., § 275), United Kingdom (ibid., § 277) and United States (ibid., § 278).

[36] See, e.g., the legislation of Azerbaijan (ibid., § 283), Bangladesh (ibid., § 284), Colombia (ibid., § 286), Estonia (ibid., § 290), Ireland (ibid., § 291), Norway (ibid., § 292), Spain (ibid., § 294), Ukraine (ibid., § 295), Venezuela (ibid., § 297) and Vietnam (ibid., § 298); see also the legislation of the Czech Republic (ibid., § 288), Slovakia (ibid., § 293) and Uruguay (ibid., § 296), the application of which is not excluded in time of non-international armed conflict, and the draft legislation of Argentina (ibid., § 282) and El Salvador (ibid., § 289).

[37] Argentina, National Court of Appeals, Military Junta case (ibid., § 299).

[38] See, e.g., the statements of Australia (ibid., § 300), Rwanda (ibid., § 311), Uruguay (ibid., § 314) and Yugoslavia (ibid., § 315), the practice of Honduras (ibid., § 304) and the reported practice of Jordan (ibid., § 307), Malaysia (ibid., § 308) and Philippines (ibid., § 309).

[39] See, e.g., the statements of South Africa (ibid., § 312) and Yugoslavia (ibid., § 315); UN Commission on Human Rights, Report of the Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights in Burundi (ibid., § 320); ONUSAL, Report of the Director of the Human Rights Division (ibid., § 322).

[redacted]

3103

5730 parties to both international and non-international armed conflicts to respect this rule.[40]

Interpretation

The obligation to protect and care for the wounded, sick and shipwrecked is an obligation of means. Each party to the conflict must use its best efforts to provide protection and care for the wounded, sick and shipwrecked, including permitting humanitarian organisations to provide for their protection and care. Practice shows that humanitarian organisations, including the ICRC, have engaged in the protection and care of the wounded, sick and shipwrecked. It is clear that in practice these organisations need permission from the party in control of a certain area to provide protection and care, but such permission must not be denied arbitrarily (see also commentary to Rule 55).

In addition, the possibility of calling on the civilian population to assist in the care of the wounded, sick and shipwrecked is recognised in practice. Aid offered by the civilian population is recognised by the 1864 Geneva Convention, the First Geneva Convention and Additional Protocols I and II.[41] This possibility is also recognised in a number of military manuals.[42]

The rule that no distinction may be made among the wounded, sick and shipwrecked except on medical grounds is often expressed in international humanitarian law as a prohibition of "adverse distinction" (see also Rule 88). This means that a distinction may be made which is beneficial, in particular by treating persons requiring urgent medical attention first, without this being discriminatory treatment between those treated first and those treated afterwards. This principle is set forth in many military manuals.[43] It is also supported by [40] See, e.g., ICRC, Memorandum on the Applicability of International Humanitarian Law (ibid., §§ 329 and 397), Press Releases Nos. 1658 and 1659 (ibid., § 330), Press Release, Tajikistan: ICRC urges respect for humanitarian rules (ibid., § 331), Press Release No. 1670 (ibid., §§ 332 and 398), Communication to the Press No. 93/17 (ibid., § 333), Press Release No. 1764 (ibid., § 334), Memorandum on Respect for International Humanitarian Law in Angola (ibid., §§ 336 and 399), Memorandum on Compliance with International Humanitarian Law by the Forces Participating in Operation Turquoise (ibid., §§ 337 and 400), Press Release No. 1793 (ibid., § 338), Press Release No. 1797 (ibid., § 339) and Communication to the Press No. 00/42 (ibid., § 340).

[41] 1864 Geneva Convention, Article 5; First Geneva Convention, Article 18 (ibid., § 195); Additional Protocol I, Article 17(2) (adopted by consensus) (ibid., § 200); Additional Protocol II, Article 18(1) (adopted by consensus) (ibid., § 203).

[42] See, e.g., the military manuals of Argentina (ibid., § 214), Cameroon (ibid., § 224), Canada (ibid., §§ 225–226), Croatia (ibid., § 232), Germany (ibid., § 240), Kenya (ibid., § 247), New Zealand (ibid., § 255), Russia (ibid., § 266), Sweden (ibid., § 272), Switzerland (ibid., § 273), United Kingdom (ibid., §§ 276–277) and United States (ibid., §§ 278–279).

[43] See, e.g., the military manuals of Argentina (ibid., §§ 354–355), Australia (ibid., §§ 356–357), Belgium (ibid., § 358), Canada (ibid., §§ 360–361), Colombia (ibid., § 362), Ecuador (ibid., § 363), France (ibid., § 364), Germany (ibid., § 365), Hungary (ibid., § 366), Netherlands (ibid., §§ 369–370), New Zealand (ibid., § 371), Nigeria (ibid., §§ 372–373), Senegal (ibid., § 377), Spain (ibid., § 378), Switzerland (ibid., § 379), United Kingdom (ibid., § 381), United States (ibid., §§ 382–383) and Yugoslavia (ibid., § 385).

3104

the requirement of respect for medical ethics, as set forth in Additional Protocols I and II (see also Rule 26), to the effect that medical personnel may not be required to give priority to any person, except on medical grounds.[44]

Rule 111. Each party to the conflict must take all possible measures to protect the wounded, sick and shipwrecked against ill-treatment and against pillage of their personal property.

Practice

Volume II, Chapter 34, Section C.

Summary

State practice establishes this rule as a norm of customary international law applicable in both international and non-international armed conflicts. The acts against which the wounded, sick and shipwrecked have to be protected according to this rule, namely pillage and ill-treatment, are prohibited pursuant to Rules 52 and 87.

International armed conflicts

The obligation to take all possible measures to protect the wounded, sick and shipwrecked from pillage and ill-treatment in the context of international armed conflicts was first codified in the 1906 Geneva Convention and 1907 Hague Convention (X).[45] It is now set forth in the 1949 Geneva Conventions.[46]

Numerous military manuals refer to the duty to take all possible measures to protect the wounded, sick and shipwrecked against ill-treatment and pillage.[47] In particular, many manuals prohibit pillage of the wounded, sick and shipwrecked, sometimes referred to as "marauding", or specify that it constitutes a war crime.[48] For a definition of pillage, see Rule 52.

[44] Additional Protocol I, Article 15(3) (adopted by consensus) (ibid., § 347); Additional Protocol II, Article 9(2) (adopted by consensus) (ibid., § 349).

[45] 1906 Geneva Convention, Article 28 (ibid., § 403); Hague Convention (X), Article 16 (ibid., § 404).

[46] First Geneva Convention, Article 15, first paragraph (ibid., § 405); Second Geneva Convention, Article 18, first paragraph (ibid., § 406); Fourth Geneva Convention, Article 16, second paragraph (ibid., § 407).

[47] See, e.g., the military manuals of Argentina (ibid., § 415), Australia (ibid., § 416), Canada (ibid., §§ 419–420), Colombia (ibid., § 421), Germany (ibid., § 424), Indonesia (ibid., § 427), New Zealand (ibid., § 432), Nigeria (ibid., § 433), United Kingdom (ibid., §§ 438–439) and United States (ibid., §§ 440–441).

[48] See, e.g., the military manuals of Burkina Faso (ibid., § 417), Cameroon (ibid., § 418), Canada (ibid., § 420), Congo (ibid., § 422), France (ibid., § 423), Israel (ibid., § 425), Italy (ibid., § 426), Lebanon (ibid., § 428), Mali (ibid., § 429), Morocco (ibid., § 430), Philippines ("mistreat") (ibid., § 434), Romania (ibid., § 435), Senegal (ibid., § 436), Switzerland (ibid., § 437), United Kingdom (ibid., § 438) and United States ("mistreating") (ibid., § 442).

5732

Non-international armed conflicts

The obligation to take all possible measures to protect the wounded, sick and shipwrecked from pillage and ill-treatment in non-international armed conflicts is set forth in Additional Protocol II.[49] In addition, it is contained in a number of other instruments pertaining also to non-international armed conflicts.[50]

A number of military manuals which are applicable in or have been applied in non-international armed conflicts prohibit pillage and ill-treatment of the wounded, sick and shipwrecked or specify the obligation to take all possible measures to protect them from pillage and ill-treatment.[51] In 1991, the Chief of Staff of the Yugoslav People's Army ordered troops to prevent the pillage and mistreatment of the wounded and sick.[52]

No official contrary practice was found with respect to either international or non-international armed conflicts.

Respect by civilians for the wounded, sick and shipwrecked

Practice further indicates that civilians have a duty to respect the wounded, sick and shipwrecked. With respect to international armed conflicts, this principle is set forth in Article 18 of the First Geneva Convention and in Article 17 of Additional Protocol I.[53] It is also stated in a number of military manuals.[54] Sweden's IHL Manual, in particular, identifies Article 17 of Additional Protocol I as a codification of customary international law.[55] The Commentary on the Additional Protocols notes with respect to Article 17 of Additional Protocol I that:

The duty imposed here upon the civilian population is only to respect the wounded, sick and shipwrecked, and not to protect them. Thus it is above all an obligation to refrain from action, i.e., to commit no act of violence against the wounded or take advantage of their condition. There is no positive obligation to assist a wounded

[49] Additional Protocol II, Article 8 (adopted by consensus) (ibid., § 409).
[50] See, e.g., Memorandum of Understanding on the Application of International Humanitarian Law between Croatia and the SFRY, para. 1 (ibid., § 412); Agreement on the Application of International Humanitarian Law between the Parties to the Conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, para. 2.1 (ibid., § 413).
[51] See, e.g., the military manuals of Australia (ibid., § 416), Canada (ibid., §§ 419–420), Colombia (ibid., § 421), Germany (ibid., § 424), Italy (ibid., § 426), Lebanon (ibid., § 428), Netherlands (ibid., § 431), New Zealand (ibid., § 432) and Philippines ("mistreat") (ibid., § 434).
[52] Yugoslavia, Order No. 579 of the Chief of General Staff of the Yugoslav People's Army (ibid., § 519).
[53] First Geneva Convention, Article 18, second paragraph (ibid., § 524); Additional Protocol I, Article 17(1) (adopted by consensus) (ibid., § 525).
[54] See, e.g., the military manuals of Argentina (ibid., § 527), Australia (ibid., § 528), Germany (ibid., § 529), Spain (ibid., § 530), Switzerland (ibid., § 532), United Kingdom (ibid., § 533) and United States (ibid., §§ 534–535).
[55] Sweden, IHL Manual (ibid., § 531).

3106

 5733

person, though obviously the possibility of imposing such an obligation remains open for national legislation, and in several countries the law has indeed provided for the obligation to assist persons who are in danger, on pain of penal sanctions.[56]

The duty of civilians to respect the wounded, sick and shipwrecked also applies in non-international armed conflicts, because non-respect would be a violation of the fundamental guarantees accorded to all persons hors de combat (see Chapter 32). Under the Statute of the International Criminal Court, it is a war crime for anyone to kill or wound a person hors de combat whether in international or non-international armed conflicts.[57]

[56] Yves Sandoz, Christophe Swinarski, Bruno Zimmermann (eds.), Commentary on the Additional Protocols, ICRC, Geneva, 1987, § 701.

[57] ICC Statute, Article 8(2)(a)(i) and (c)(i) (cited in Vol. II, Ch. 32, §§ 675–676) and Article 8(2)(b)(VI) (cited in Vol. II, Ch. 15, § 217).

5734

THE HANDBOOK OF

COMPARATIVE CRIMINAL LAW

Edited by

KEVIN JON HELLER AND MARKUS D. DUBBER

3108

5735

Stanford University Press
Stanford, California

©2011 by the Board of Trustees of the Leland Stanford Junior University.
All rights reserved.

No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system without the prior written permission of Stanford University Press.

Printed in the United States of America on acid-free, archival-quality paper

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

The handbook of comparative criminal law / edited by Kevin Jon Heller and Markus D. Dubber.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-0-8047-5758-4 (cloth : alk. paper)
1. Criminal law. 2. Comparative law. I. Heller, Kevin Jon. II. Dubber, Markus Dirk.
K5015.4.H36 2011
345--dc22 2010020243

Typeset by Westchester Book Group in 10/13.5 Minion.

3109

5736

THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

Kevin Jon Heller

I. Introduction
  A. Historical Sketch
  B. Jurisdiction
  C. Legality Principle
  D. Sources of Criminal Law
  E. Process
II. General Part
  A. Theories of Punishment
  B. Liability Requirements
  C. Defenses
  D. Sanctions
III. Special Part
  A. Structure
  B. Genocide
  C. Crimes against Humanity
  D. War Crimes
  E. Aggression

I. INTRODUCTION

A. Historical Sketch

The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC, also the Court) entered into force on 1 July 2002, less than four years after 120 countries voted in favor of its adoption.[1]

Kevin Jon Heller is a Senior Lecturer at Melbourne Law School. His recent publications include "The Cognitive Psychology of Mens Rea," 99 Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 317 (2009), and "Mistake of Legal Element, the Common Law, and Article 32 of the Rome Statute: A Critical Analysis," 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 419 (2008).

3110

facts—convicting a defendant charged with committing war crimes, for example, of crimes against humanity instead. That right is common in inquisitorial systems but generally foreign to adversarial ones.[78]

II. GENERAL PART

Part 3 of the Rome Statute, titled "General Principles of Criminal Law," has been described as an "unsystematic conglomeration from a variety of legal traditions."[79] That description has a superficial plausibility, because the drafters deliberately avoided tradition-specific terminology, particularly that of the common law: the Statute defines crimes in terms of required "material elements" and "mental elements," not in terms of actus reus and mens rea; and it provides "grounds for excluding criminal responsibility" instead of defenses. In general, however, it is clear that the Statute's "two-pronged concept of crime"[80] is patterned after the common law, not the civil law. First, "it does not distinguish between the subjective/mental element of the offense, in the sense of a Tatvorsatz (dolus) and the blameworthiness of the act belonging to a separate and autonomous (third) level of culpability (Schuld)."[81] Second, the system "does not distinguish between wrongfulness/justification and culpability/excuse as the two- or three-fold structure of an offense as applied in the Germanic systems."[82]

A. Theories of Punishment

The Preamble to the Rome Statute affirms that "the most serious crimes of concern to the community must not go unpunished" and states the determination of the states parties "to put an end to impunity for the perpetrators of these crimes and thus to contribute to the prevention of such crimes." Retribution and deterrence, therefore, are the Court's primary sentencing objectives.

In giving meaning to these objectives, the ICC's judges will no doubt be guided by the sentencing practices of previous international tribunals. Those tribunals have consistently emphasized the importance of retribution,[83] although they have been careful to insist that punishment imposed for retributive purposes "is not to be understood as fulfilling a desire for revenge, but as duly expressing the outrage of the international community at these crimes."[84] A sentence must, therefore, always be proportionate to the seriousness of the crime.[85]

International tribunals have also recognized the importance of deterrence.[86] They have normally insisted, however, that the deterrent effect of punishment "must not be accorded undue prominence" in sentencing decisions, because punishment is supposed to deter by "bringing about the development of a culture of respect for the rule of law and not simply the fear of the consequences of breaking the law."[87] Promoting deterrence through retributively disproportionate sentences is thus unacceptable.[88]

B. Liability Requirements

1. Objective/Actus Reus

As noted earlier, the drafters of the Rome Statute made a conscious decision to refer to "material elements" instead of to an actus reus. There is no general provision in the Statute concerning material elements; instead, following the Model Penal Code, article 30 of the Statute ("Mental Element") simply refers to conduct elements, consequence elements, and circumstance elements.[89] The material elements of a crime are thus "those characteristics . . . of the actor's behavior that, when combined with the appropriate level of culpability, will constitute the offense."[90]

A conduct element specifies the positive act or omission prohibited by the crime in question. The war crime of unlawful deportation or transfer, for example, requires the perpetrator to have "deported or transferred one or more persons to another State or to another location."[91]

A consequence element specifies the required result of the prohibited conduct. That result may involve either actual harm, such as the crime against humanity of torture's requirement that "[t]he perpetrator inflicted severe physical or mental pain or suffering upon one or more persons,"[92] or simply the possibility of harm, such as the war crime of biological experiment's requirement that an experiment "seriously endangered the physical or mental health or integrity" of the victim.[93]

A circumstance element specifies an additional state of affairs that must exist for the prohibited conduct and consequence to be criminal. That state of affairs can be either factual or legal. For example, the war crime of using child soldiers requires the children to have been "under the age of 15 years,"[94] a factual circumstance, while the war crime of denying a fair trial requires the defendant to have been "protected under one or more of the Geneva Conventions of 1949,"[95] a legal circumstance.

i. Act

The Rome Statute does not specify what qualifies as an "act" for purposes of a conduct element. Nevertheless, because article 30 defines intent in relation to conduct as "mean[ing] to engage in the conduct," it is clear that a conduct element is satisfied as long as the person voluntarily committed the prohibited act.[96] Involuntary actions, such as those committed in a state of automatism, do not qualify.[97]

ii. Omission

Various provisions in the Rome Statute and the Elements of Crimes criminalize specific omissions. The war crime of starvation as a method of warfare, for example, prohibits "depriv[ing] civilians of objects indispensable to their survival."[98] Similarly, a military commander (or civilian superior) can be punished for failing to prevent his subordinates from committing international crimes or for failing to punish those crimes once they are brought to his attention.[99]

General liability for omissions, however, proved to be one of the most controversial issues during the drafting of the Rome Statute. Article 28 of the 1998 Draft ICC Statute, then still titled "Actus Reus," provided that "conduct for which a person may be criminally responsible and liable for punishment can constitute either an act or an omission, or a combination thereof." Most states supported the provision, but a "small minority," particularly France, insisted that liability for omissions should be limited to specific crimes. The Preparatory Committee initially compromised by replacing references to "an act or an omission" with the more vague "conduct." When even that compromise met with resistance, the Diplomatic Conference decided to drop the actus reus article entirely.[100] It is will thus be up to the Court to determine—keeping in mind article 22's prohibition of extending the definition of crimes by analogy—whether omissions other than those specified in the Rome Statute and the Elements of Crimes are criminal.[101]

iii. Status

There are no status crimes in the Rome Statute, but the concept is not foreign to international criminal law. Control Council Law no. 10, enacted by the Allies after World War II, declared that "[m]embership in categories of a criminal group or organization declared criminal by the International Military Tribunal is recognized as a crime." A number of defendants in the various war-crimes trials held pursuant to Law No. 10 were later convicted of membership in the Schutzstaffel (SS), the Gestapo, or the Leadership Corps of the Nazi Party.[102]

2. Subjective/Mens Rea/Mental Element

The mental element of a crime is determined by article 30 of the Rome Statute, which provides in paragraph 1 that "unless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge." Article 30 thus takes an "element analysis" approach to mens rea that is similar to, and almost certainly based on, the approach taken by the Model Penal Code.[103]

Despite the plain language of paragraph 1, however, article 30 does not actually apply the default "intent and knowledge" requirement to every kind of material element. As discussed in the following subsections, paragraphs 2 and 3 of article 30 make clear that the intent requirement applies only to conduct and consequence elements, while the knowledge requirement applies only to consequence and circumstance elements. Intent and knowledge are thus both required only for consequence elements.[104]

i. Intent

Article 30(2) defines intent differently depending on whether the material element in question involves conduct or a consequence. A perpetrator acts with intent in regard to a conduct element when he or she "means to engage in the conduct."[105] This definition, with its volitional emphasis, is functionally equivalent to "purpose" in the Model Penal Code[106] and to dol général in French criminal law.[107]

A perpetrator acts with intent in regard to a consequence element, by contrast, when he or she either "means to cause that consequence" or "is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.[108] The first definition is explicitly volitional and corresponds to "purpose" and the civil law's dolus directus in the first degree.[109]

The correct interpretation of article 30's second definition of intent, which is cognitive instead of volitional, is controversial. Textually, the definition is equivalent to "knowledge" in the Model Penal Code, to the common law's "oblique intent," and to the civil law's dolus directus in the second degree, all of which require the perpetrator to recognize that it is virtually certain that his or her conduct will lead to the prohibited consequence.[110] The question is whether the definition also includes dolus eventualis, which is satisfied if the perpetrator reconciles himself or herself to the possibility that his or her conduct may lead to the prohibited consequence.[111] The Pre-Trial Chamber has held that article 30's cognitive definition of intent includes dolus eventualis,[112] and a number of scholars agree.[113] That position, however, contradicts the plain language of the article: "[I]t is not enough for the perpetrator to merely anticipate the possibility that his conduct would cause the consequence. This follows from the words 'will occur'; after all, it does not say 'may occur.' "[114]

Finally, it is important to note that a number of crimes in the Rome Statute also require the perpetrator to act with specific intent or dolus specialis. Some of these "otherwise provided" requirements modify article 30's default "intent and knowledge" requirement with regard to a material element. A perpetrator is guilty of hostage taking, for example, only if he or she specifically intends his or her act to "compel a State . . . to act or refrain from acting as an explicit or implicit condition for the safety or the release of such person or persons";[115] knowledge of that consequence is not enough. Others supplement article 30 because they do not apply to the material elements of a crime. To commit the crime of genocide, for example, the perpetrator must not only have acted with intent and knowledge regarding the material elements of the crime, such as killing members of a protected group, but must also have acted with the specific intent "to destroy" that group "in whole or in part."[116]

ii. Knowledge

Article 30(3) provides two different definitions of knowledge. The first definition, which concerns consequence elements, is the same as article 30(2)'s definition of intent with regard to consequences: "awareness that . . . a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events." The fact that both intent and knowledge are required for circumstance elements is thus effectively meaningless; in practice, knowledge is all that is required.

The second definition concerns knowledge in relation to circumstance elements. Here knowledge is defined as "awareness that a circumstance exists." This is a very high threshold, going beyond the Model Penal Code's definition of knowledge, which is satisfied as long as the perpetrator is "aware of a high probability of [a circumstance's] existence, unless he actually believes it doesn't exist."[117] It also seems to exclude willful blindness, even in Glanville Williams's restrictive formulation: "He suspected the fact; he realized its probability; but he refrained from obtaining the final confirmation because he wanted in the event to be able to deny knowledge."[118]

iii. Recklessness

With one exception, common-law recklessness is never sufficient for criminal responsibility under the Rome Statute. Earlier drafts of article 30 included a definition of recklessness, but that provision was deleted when the drafters realized that the word reckless did not appear in any of the definitions of crimes.[119] Moreover, most of the states that were involved in drafting the article were reluctant to base criminal responsibility for serious international crimes on recklessness.[120]

The one exception concerns the responsibility of civilian superiors, a form of complicity. Article 28(b)(1) provides that a civilian superior is responsible for failing to prevent and/or punish crimes committed by subordinates if he or she "knew, or consciously disregarded information which early indicated, that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes." Scholars agree that the "consciously disregarded" language is equivalent to recklessness.[121]

iv. Negligence

The drafters of part 3 were equally reluctant to base criminal responsibility on negligence, in either its common-law or its civil law form.[122] Nevertheless, negligence appears both in the Rome Statute and in the Elements of Crimes as an "otherwise provided" mental element. Article 28(a)(1) of the Statute provides that a military commander is responsible for failing to prevent and/or punish crimes committed by his subordinate forces if he "knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known, that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes." Moreover, the Elements apply a common-law negligence standard to a number of factual circumstances required by various war crimes. The war crime of improperly using the distinctive emblems of the Geneva Conventions, for example, requires that the perpetrator "knew or should have known of the prohibited nature of such use."[123]

3. Causation

There is no specific causation provision in the Rome Statute. The 1998 Draft Statute provided that "[a] person is only criminally responsible under this Statute for committing a crime if the harm required for the commission of a crime is caused by and [accountable] [attributable] to his or her act or omission," but that provision was deleted prior to the Diplomatic Conference.[124] Most scholars agree, however, that a causation requirement is implicit in the Rome Statute whenever a crime contains a consequence element.[125] Indeed, article 30 initially defined intent with regard to a consequence as "mean[ing] to cause that consequence." Causation requirements are also explicitly required by certain crimes, such as genocide by causing serious bodily or mental harm[126] and the war crime of willfully causing great suffering.[127]

4. Theories of Liability

Article 25 of the Rome Statute provides a comprehensive list of the possible modes of participation in the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court. The article thus represents a significant advance over previous international tribunals, which "did not pay much attention to distinguishing different modes of participation . . . but rather applied a so-called unified perpetrator model. The guiding principle was that any support or promotion of the crime was to be considered criminal participation."[128] The Nuremberg Military Tribunals, for example, routinely convicted defendants because they were "principals in, accessories to, ordered, abetted, took a consenting part in, were connected with plans and enterprises involving, [or] were members of organizations or groups connected with, atrocities."[129]

Article 25 divides modes of participation into four categories: (1) commission,[130] (2) ordering and instigating,[131] (3) assistance,[132] and (4) contribution to a group crime.[133] Modes of participation in category 1 are forms of principal liability; modes in categories 2–4 are forms of accessory liability. What distinguishes principals from accessories is "control over the crime": principal perpetrators either "physically carry out the objective by means, the Rome Statute marks its first explicit appearance in international criminal law.[143] Unlike some national systems, however, article 25(3)(a) of the Rome Statute provides that a perpetrator by means is responsible for the crime committed by the direct perpetrator "regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible."[144]

The Pre-Trial Chamber applied perpetration by means in the Katanga case, relying specifically on German criminal law.[145] According to the Pre-Trial Chamber, this form of participation is particularly relevant when the perpetrator behind the perpetrator—Täter hinter dem Täter—commits an international crime through another by means of his or her "control over an organized apparatus of power."[146] Objectively, such control has four elements. First, the apparatus must be "based on hierarchical relations between superiors and subordinates."[147] Second, the apparatus must be "composed of sufficient subordinates to guarantee that superiors' orders will be carried out, if not by one subordinate, then by another."[148] Third, each superior must exercise sufficient "authority and control" over the apparatus—normally because of his or her capacity to "hire, train, impose discipline, [or] provide resources"—that his or her orders will automatically produce their desired results.[149] Fourth, each superior must actually mobilize his or her authority and control over the apparatus to commit a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court.[150] Subjectively, perpetrators by means must not only act with the mental state necessary for the underlying crime[151] but must also "be aware of the character of their organizations, their authority within the organization, and the factual circumstances enabling near-automatic compliance with their orders."[152]

ii. Ordering and Instigating

a. Ordering

Article 25(3)(b) holds criminally responsible a person who "[o]rders . . . the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted." Ordering presumes the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship: the superior uses his or her position of command to compel the subordinate to commit the crime.[153]

By virtue of its placement in paragraph b, ordering is a form of accessory liability. A number of scholars, however, have suggested that ordering is better understood as a form of perpetration by means, given that "exploiting a hierarchical power structure in terms of organizational predominance is typical of such intermediary perpetration."[154] Categorizing ordering as a form of accessory liability also fails to reflect the fact that the superior's culpability for the crime is greater than the subordinate's, because the superior not only violates his or her duty to control the subordinates but also misuses his or her power in order to ensure that the crime is committed.[155]

b. Soliciting and Inducing

Article 25(3)(b) also holds criminally responsible a person who "solicits or induces the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted." No superior-subordinate relationship is necessary for soliciting or inducing; an instigator is simply someone who "prompts" another to commit an international crime,[156] usually by means of psychological pressure.[157] A causal link between the instigation and the crime is necessary, but it is sufficient if the instigation "substantially" contributes to the direct perpetrator's decision to act.[158] Subjectively, under article 30, the instigator must either intend that the direct perpetrator commit the crime or recognize that the crime will be committed "in the ordinary course of events."

iii. Assistance

Article 25(3)(c) holds criminally responsible a person who, "[f]or the purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime, aids, abets or otherwise assists in its commission or its attempted commission, including providing the means for its commission." This category of accessory liability covers assistance that does not rise to the level of ordering and instigating but is more significant than mere contribution to a group crime. It includes, according to the ICTY, any "practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime."[159] Article 25(3)(c) does not itself require a "substantial effect," but most scholars believe that the requirement is implicit in the paragraph, given that the ILC's 1996 Draft Code of Crimes explicitly included it.[160]

Subjectively, the assistance must not only be intentionally provided, as required by article 30, but must also be provided "for the purpose" of facilitating the crime. This "otherwise provided" specific-intent requirement, which is borrowed from the Model Penal Code,[161] means that the perpetrator must have consciously intended the direct perpetrator to commit the crime[162]—a much higher standard than the one applied by the ICTY and the ICTR, which have held that aiding and abetting only requires the perpetrator to know that his or her assistance will facilitate the direct perpetrator's commission of the crime.[163]

iv. Contribution

Finally, article 25(3)(d) holds criminally responsible a person who "[i]n any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose." This provision, which is copied almost verbatim from the International Convention on the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings of 1997, resulted from contentious debates during the drafting over whether to include conspiracy in the Rome Statute.[164] It is a residual form of accessory liability that applies "to indirect forms of assistance—such as financing the group—that do not warrant liability for either co-perpetration or aiding and abetting, as they have no substantial effect on the commission of the crime under international law."[165] Subjectively, such assistance must be made either "with the aim of furthering" the group's criminal activity or "in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime."[166] The difference seems to be that the second standard requires the prosecution to prove that the person knew the specific crime the group intended to commit, whereas the first standard requires it to prove only that the person intended to further the group's general criminal activity.[167]

v. Inchoate Crimes

a. Conspiracy

Conspiracy is not criminal under the Rome Statute. Earlier versions of the Statute oscillated between the traditional common-law approach to conspiracy, which views conspiracy as an inchoate crime, and the civil law approach, which views conspiracy as a mode of participation in a crime.[168] The difficulty of reconciling those traditions ultimately led the drafters to compromise by replacing conspiracy with the idea of contribution to a group crime, art. 25(3)(d) of the Statute.[169]

5745

b. Incitement to Genocide

Article 25(3)(e) holds criminally responsible a person who, "[i]n respect of the crime of genocide, directly and publicly incites others to commit genocide." This provision, which is borrowed from the Genocide Convention, is a purely inchoate crime: the incited genocide need not be carried out or even attempted.[170] A perpetrator incites "publicly" by "communicating the call for criminal action to a number of individuals in a public place or to members of the general public at large," usually through radio or television.[171] A perpetrator incites "directly" by "specifically urging another individual to take immediate criminal action rather than making a vague or indirect suggestion."[172] The later qualification obviously blurs the line between incitement and other forms of accessorial liability, such as solicitation and inducement.

Scholars agree that, subjectively, a perpetrator must intend to incite his or her listeners to commit an act of genocide, such as killing members of a protected group, with the specific intent to destroy that group in whole or in part.[173] They disagree, however, concerning whether the perpetrator must also possess that specific intent, as is the norm in national criminal codes.[174] It is difficult to imagine a situation in which a perpetrator who does not have genocidal intent would intentionally try to incite that intent in others. Nevertheless, because incitement to genocide does not "otherwise provide" a specific-intent requirement, unlike aiding and abetting and contributing to a group crime, the perpetrator would likely be guilty of incitement in such a situation.[175]

c. Attempt

Article 25(3)(f) holds criminally responsible a person who "[a]ttempts to commit such a crime by taking action that commences its execution by means of a substantial step, but the crime does not occur because of circumstances independent of the person's intentions." General criminal responsibility for attempts is an innovation of the Rome Statute; previously, "neither a duly generalized nor an adequate concept of attempt" existed in international criminal law.[176]

Objectively, article 25(3)(f) represents an amalgamation of French law (commencement d'exécution) and the Model Penal Code ("substantial step").[177] Preparatory acts do not qualify as substantial steps because they do not represent a "commencement of execution." The perpetrator is not required, however, to fulfill one of the physical elements of the crime; most scholars agree that the attempt provision is patterned after German criminal law's concept of attempt, which equates commencement with acts committed "immediately proceeding to the accomplishment of the elements of the offense" (unmittlebares Ansetzen zur Tatbestandverwirklichung).[178]

d. Abandonment

Article 25(3)(f) also provides that "a person who abandons the effort to commit the crime or otherwise prevents the completion of the crime shall not be liable for punishment under this Statute for the attempt to commit that crime if that person completely and voluntarily gave up the criminal purpose." Although abandonment is likely a general principle of criminal law, it was included in the Rome Statute only at the last minute. The provision is based on the Model Penal Code[179] and is thus, by requiring the perpetrator to both physically abandon the attempt and renounce his or her criminal intention, more strict than many national criminal codes.[180]

3119

5746

vi. Superior Responsibility

Superior responsibility is "an original creation of international criminal law."[181] At the broadest level, it holds military commanders and civilian superiors criminally responsible for failing to prevent their subordinates from committing international crimes or for failing to punish those crimes once they are brought to their attention.

The nature of superior responsibility is controversial. Some national legal systems treat it as a form of complicity, while others consider it an independent crime of omission akin to dereliction of duty.[182] Article 28 of the Rome Statute adopts the former approach, providing that a superior who fails to prevent or punish crimes committed by his or her subordinates "shall be criminally responsible" for those crimes.[183]

According to article 28, superior responsibility involves four elements. First, a superior-subordinate relationship must exist. The essence of that relationship is the superior's "effective control" over the direct perpetrators, understood as the "material ability to prevent and punish commission of the offenses."[184] Military commanders often possess effective control de jure, by virtue of their rank. Some civilian superiors, such as government officials, also exercise de jure control over their subordinates. De facto effective control is sufficient, however, in both the military and civilian contexts.[185]

Second, the superior must have the requisite mental element concerning his or her subordinates' crimes. Unlike the statutes of previous international tribunals, the Rome Statute holds military commanders and civilian superiors to different standards. A military commander is criminally responsible if he or she "either knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes"[186]—a negligence-like standard that asks whether the commander, "in the proper exercise of his duties, would have gained knowledge" of the crimes.[187] A civilian superior, by contrast, is criminally responsible only if he or she "either knew, or consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated, that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes"[188]—a standard that seems to include both recklessness and willful blindness.[189]

Third, the superior must have failed to take "necessary and reasonable measures" to either prevent or punish his or her subordinate's crimes. What measures qualify as necessary and reasonable must be determined on a case-by-case basis, taking into account the degree of the superior's effective control: the greater the control, the greater the superior's obligation to take preventive or punitive measures. Typical prevention measures include teaching subordinates about the principles of international humanitarian law and creating effective systems of supervision, reporting, and sanctioning. With regard to punishment, the Rome Statute specifically mentions submitting subordinates' crimes "to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution."[190]

Fourth, and finally, the subordinates' crimes must "result" from the superior's failure to exercise proper control over them.[191] This is clearly a negative causality requirement: the superior can only be held responsible for his or her subordinates' crimes insofar as,

3120

"but for his failure to fulfill his duty to act, the acts of his subordinates would not have been committed."[192]

vii. Corporate Criminal Liability

Article 25(1) of the Rome Statute provides that "[t]he Court shall have jurisdiction over natural persons pursuant to this Statute." Legal persons, therefore, cannot be held criminally responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court. This exclusion was a relatively late development: earlier versions of article 25 included an option to extend the Court's jurisdiction to legal as well as to natural persons.[193] That option was ultimately deleted at the Diplomatic Conference, largely because the idea of corporate criminal liability was simply alien to a number of national legal systems.[194]

C. Defenses

1. Types of Defense

As noted earlier, because they wanted to avoid tradition-specific language, the drafters of the Rome Statute chose to refer to "grounds for excluding criminal responsibility" instead of to "defenses." The Statute approaches those grounds in three different ways. First, articles 31–33 make certain defenses specifically available to a defendant. Some, such as self-defense, are traditionally categorized as justifications; others, such as mental disease or defect, are traditionally categorized as excuses. The Rome Statute, however, does not distinguish between the two.[195] Indeed, article 31(1)(d) collapses a justification (necessity) and an excuse (duress) into a single ground.

Second, article 31(2) provides that "[t]he Court shall determine the applicability of the grounds for excluding criminal responsibility provided for in this Statute to the case before it." If this provision simply authorizes the Court to prevent a defendant from raising a ground that is not supported by sufficient evidence, it is unproblematic. The provision will clearly run afoul of the principle of legality, however, if it authorizes the Court to exclude a ground for nonevidentiary reasons of "justice" or "fairness."[196] Unfortunately, the drafting history seems to support the latter interpretation.[197]

Third, and finally, article 31(3) gives the court the right to "consider a ground for excluding criminal responsibility other than those referred to . . . where such a ground is derived from applicable law as set forth in article 21." Such grounds will normally be found in customary international law.[198]

2. Burden of Proof

Article 66(2) of the Rome Statute provides that "[t]he onus is on the Prosecutor to prove the guilt of the accused." The relevant burden is—as it has been at every international tribunal since Nuremberg—proof beyond a reasonable doubt.[199] In addition, article 67(1)(i) guarantees a defendant the right "[n]ot to have imposed on him or her any reversal of the burden of proof or any onus of rebuttal." The latter provision is particularly important, because it implies that the Rome Statute follows the Model Penal Code in requiring the prosecution to disprove the existence of grounds for excluding criminal responsibility proffered by the defendant, at least insofar as those grounds are supported by sufficient evidence.[200] That is the position taken by Roger Clark,[201] one of the most important drafters of 322

Introduction to CRIME, LAW and JUSTICE in Hong Kong

Edited by

Mark S. Gaylord, Danny Gittings and Harold Traver

香港大學出版社
HONG KONG UNIVERSITY PRESS

5748

8123

Hong Kong University Press
14/F Hing Wai Centre
7 Tin Wan Praya Road
Aberdeen
Hong Kong

© Hong Kong University Press 2009

ISBN 978-962-209-978-4

All rights reserved. No portion of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopy, recording, or any information storage or retrieval system, without prior permission in writing from the publisher.

British Library Cataloguing-in-Publication Data
A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Secure On-line Ordering http://www.hkupress.org

BIBLIOTH... DU P... DE...

Printed and bound by Lammar Offset Printing Ltd., Hong Kong, China.

Contents

Preface vii

Contributors ix

1 Introduction to Crime, Law and Justice in Hong Kong 1
Mark S. Gaylord, Danny Gittings and Harold Traver

2 Criminal Law 17
Michael Jackson

3 Counting Crime in Hong Kong 35
Yiu Wah CHEUNG and Nicole W. T. CHEUNG

4 Hong Kong Police Force 55
Harold Traver

5 Customs and Excise Department 77
Mark S. Gaylord

6 Independent Commission Against Corruption 91
Ian McWalters and Ann Carver

7 Prosecutions Division of the Department of Justice 111
Simon N. M. Young

8 Legal Assistance 131
P. Y. Lo

9 Hong Kong Judiciary 147
Danny Gittings

10 Court Interpreters' Office 169
Kwai Hang NG

S 744

If the accused wishes to raise any of these matters in defence, evidence of them must be adduced at trial. Once that is done, the prosecutor must then disprove the defence beyond reasonable doubt. If the evidence leaves a doubt, the prosecutor will have failed to disprove the defence and the accused will be entitled to an acquittal.

Parties

Criminal liability is not restricted to the persons, known as "principals", who actually committed the prohibited activity. Others who assisted or encouraged the principals in committing the offence, or caused its commission, may also be liable. These persons, known as "secondary parties" or "accessories", can be convicted of the same offence as the principal, and are subject to the same potential penalties, although they will generally be sentenced more leniently than the principal offender(s). A person may only be convicted as a secondary party, however, where the offence in question has actually been committed. Where it has not, a secondary party may instead be liable for inciting, conspiring or attempting an offence. These three offences, based on preparatory acts, are collectively called "inchoate" offences.

Secondary Party Liability

Secondary party liability will arise firstly if it is proved that the accused assisted or encouraged the principal in committing the offence, either then or at some earlier time, in either case with knowledge or foresight of what the principal intended to do and, further, with the intention of assisting or encouraging the principal. In addition, it must generally be shown that the principal was aware of the accused's assistance or encouragement. A person who is liable in this way is known as either an "aider", "abettor", "counsellor", or "procurer", depending on what exactly is proved, and whether the alleged secondary party was present at the scene when the principal committed the offence. A person who, for example, supplied a gun to another, knowing or foreseeing that the other intended to commit an armed robbery and intending to help, may be held liable as a secondary party to the armed robbery if it occurs. This action would be considered aiding if the supplier was present at the time of the armed robbery; otherwise it would be considered procuring.

A second means of establishing secondary liability is by proving that the offence in question was committed in the course of a "joint enterprise" or by "common design". In this case, every person (other than the person who actually committed the offence) who agreed to participate in the joint enterprise knowing or foreseeing the possible commission of the offence while carrying out the joint enterprise, may be convicted as a secondary party to the offence in question. For example, consider the hypothetical case where three persons agree to burgle an apartment. One of them acts as lookout while the other two physically break in. Since the lookout does not perform acts amounting to actual burglary he is not a principal. But he will be liable as a secondary party for burglary because burglary was contemplated or foreseen by him. Assume, however, that during the burglary one of the two actual burglars intentionally stabs and kills someone in the apartment. The lookout would not be liable as a secondary party to the murder committed by that other person unless the intentional use of a knife was contemplated or foreseen by the lookout as a possible incident of carrying out the burglary.

Vicarious Liability

In general, a person cannot be made criminally liable for the conduct of another on the ground solely that he was responsible for the conduct of that other. Thus, parents and employers cannot in general be held criminally liable for the acts of their children or employees. There are two general exceptions to this rule. First, a person may be liable for the acts of another if the offence in question is a strict liability offence and the prohibited activity can be read as applying to him or her. A shop owner, for example, may be held to have sold contaminated food (in breach of relevant regulations) even though the sale was actually made by a shop assistant. Second, a person who is under a statutory duty to do some specific act but who delegates its performance to another may be liable if that other fails to perform it.

The Impact of 1997 on the Criminal Law in Hong Kong

The law is not independent of prevailing political and social forces. Indeed, it is a product of, and must change to reflect, such forces. This is particularly true of the criminal law which, by its very nature, is one of the principal means of state control over the social and individual conduct of its citizens.

5751

OPPENHEIM'S INTERNATIONAL LAW

NINTH EDITION

Volume 1

PEACE

PARTS 2 TO 4

Edited by
SIR ROBERT JENNINGS QC
and
SIR ARTHUR WATTS KCMG QC

3125

5752

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS
Great Clarendon Street, Oxford OX2 6DP
Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship,
and education by publishing worldwide in
Oxford New York
Auckland Cape Town Dar es Salaam Hong Kong Karachi
Kuala Lumpur Madrid Melbourne Mexico City Nairobi
New Delhi Shanghai Taipei Toronto
With offices in
Argentina Austria Brazil Chile Czech Republic France Greece
Guatemala Hungary Italy Japan Poland Portugal Singapore
South Korea Switzerland Thailand Turkey Ukraine Vietnam
Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press
in the UK and in certain other countries
Published in the United States
by Oxford University Press Inc., New York
© Oxford University Press and Mrs Tomoko Hudson, 1996
The moral rights of the author have been asserted
Database right Oxford University Press (maker)
First published 1905
Ninth edition (cased) published 1992
Ninth edition (paper) published 1996
First published by Oxford University Press 2008
All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means,
without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press,
or as expressly permitted by law, or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department,
Oxford University Press, at the address above
You must not circulate this book in any other binding or cover
and you must impose this same condition on any acquirer
British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Data available
Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Data available
Printed in Great Britain
on acid-free paper by CPI Antony Rowe, Chippenham, Wiltshire by
ISBN 978-0-582-30245-7
1 3 5 7 9 10 8 6 4 2

3126

5754

EXPULSION OF ALIENS

Kobarg, Ausweisung und Abweisung von Ausländern (1930) Borchard, §§ 27–32 Blondel, Répertoire, viii, pp 105–63 Boeck, Hag R, 18 (1927), iii, pp 447–646 (an exhaustive study) Puente, AJ, 36 (1942), pp 252–70 (as to Latin-America) Parry, BDIL, 6, pp 83–241 MacDonald, Race Relations and Immigration Law (1969), pp 61–81, and The New Immigration Law (1972), Ch 10 Shearer, Extradition in International Law (1971), pp 76–91 Goodwin-Gill, International Law and the Movement of Persons between States (1973), pp 201–310 (also in BY, 47 (1974–75), pp 55–156).

§ 413 Competence to expel aliens The right of states to expel[1] aliens is generally recognised.[2] It matters not whether the alien is only on a temporary visit, or has settled down for professional business or other purposes on its territory, having established his domicile there.

On the other hand, while a state has a broad discretion in exercising its right to expel aliens, its discretion is not absolute. Thus, by customary international law it must not abuse its right by acting arbitrarily in taking its decision to expel an alien, and it must act reasonably in the manner in which it effects an expulsion.[3]

---

[1] 'Expulsion' is not a technical term, and is often used interchangeably with 'deportation': both involve the removal of a person from a state by its unilateral act, as distinct from extradition (which involves agreement and a degree of cooperation between the two states concerned). See also § 414. The practice of some states may also be distinguished, whereby destitute aliens, foreign vagabonds, suspicious aliens without identity papers, alien criminals who have served their punishment, and the like, are, without any formalities, arrested by the police and reconducted to the frontier. But although such reconduction, often called droit de renvoi, is materially not much different from expulsion, it nevertheless differs much from it in form, since expulsion is an order to leave the country, whereas reconduction is forcible conveying away of foreigners. On the practice of deportation and reconduction in the USA, see Clark, Deportation of Aliens from the United States to Europe (1931); Oppenheim, The Enforcement of the Deportation Laws of the United States (1931); Van Vleck, The Administrative Control of Aliens (1932); Hackworth, iii, §§ 293–302; Whiteman, Digest, 8, pp 603–20. See also § 414, n 9.

A state is usually unable to expel its own nationals since no other state will be obliged to receive them. It may assimilate certain aliens to its own nationals, so affecting its powers under its own laws to expel them: see Italian South Tyrol Terrorism Case (1) (1968), ILR, 71, p 235.

[2] See, eg Attorney-General for Canada v Cain [1906] AC 542; the decision of the US Supreme Court in Harisiades v Shaughnessy, ILR, 19 (1952), No 69; and the decision of the Supreme Court of Burma in Karam Singh v Controller of Immigration (1956), ILR, 28, p 311.

See now as to the law of the UK, Immigration Act 1971, ss 3(5) and (6), 5–7, and 15, and the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules 1990 (HC 251), paras 155–80. The UK Government had, until December 1919, no power to expel even the most dangerous alien without the recommendation of a court, or without an Act of Parliament making provision for such expulsion, except during war or on an occasion of imminent national danger or great emergency.

Expulsion of an alien after being lawfully admitted into a state is to be distinguished from the refusal to allow an alien to enter the state, expulsion or deportation in the two situations often being subject to different legal requirements, usually in the sense of allowing more easily the removal of those refused entry. See eg Barber v Gonzales, ILR, 20 (1953), p 276; Roggenbihl v Lusby, ibid, p 281; The State v Ibrahim Adam, ILR, 23 (1956), p 374; Leng May Ma v Barber, ILR, 26 (1958–II), p 475; R v Pringle, ex parte Mills (1968), ILR, 44, p 135.

Refusal of entry will usually involve the return of the alien to the state from which he came. Aliens who have been refused entry to a state, or who have illegally gained entry, may in the territory in which he seeks asylum, expelled or compulsorily returned to any state where he may be subjected to persecution (except only for overriding reasons of national security or in order to safeguard the population, as in the case of a mass influx of persons); and that the state granting asylum shall not permit persons who have received asylum to engage in activities contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

3128

In 1977 a Conference on Territorial Asylum was held with a view to drawing up a Convention on the matter, but it failed to reach agreement.[13] The possibility of a further session of the Conference being convened was left open.

At present the so-called right of asylum is probably nothing but the competence of every state to allow a persecuted alien to enter, and to remain on, its territory under its protection. Such fugitive alien enjoys the hospitality of the state which grants him asylum; but it might be necessary to make his entry subject to conditions, to place him under surveillance, or even to intern him at some place. For it is the duty of every state to prevent individuals living on its territory from endangering the safety of another state by organising hostile expeditions or by preparing common crimes against its head, members of its government or its property.[14]

POSITION OF ALIENS AFTER RECEPTION

Frisch in Strupp, Wört, i, pp 330–34 Delessert, L'Établissement et le séjour des étrangers (1924) Steinbach, Unter, suchungen zum internationalen Fremdenrecht (1931) The Legal Status of Aliens in Pacific Countries (ed MacKenzie, 1937) Fraser, Control of Aliens in the British Commonwealth of Nations (1940) Gibson, Aliens and the Law (1940) (as to the USA) Konvitz, The Alien and the Asiatic in American Law (1946) Borchard, §§ 6–8, 14–25, 34–46, 133–6, and Bibliotheca Visseriana, 3 (1924), pp 3–52 Churchill, LQR, 31 (1920), pp 402–28 Holdsworth, Revue d'histoire du droit, 3 (1921), pp 175–214 Fachiri, BY (1925), pp 159–71 Zaitzeff in Mich Law Rev, 24 (1926), pp 441–60 (as to aliens in Russia) S Basdevant in Répertoire, 8, pp 3–61 Cavaglieri, Hag R, 26 (1929), i, pp 452–67 Healy, ibid, 27 (1929), ii, pp 405–92 Verdross, Hag R, 37 (1931), iii, pp 348–406 Kelsen, ibid, 42 (1932), iv, pp 248–60 Cutler, AJ, 27 (1933), pp 225–46 Bouvé, AS Proceedings (1934), pp 92–105 Borchard, ibid (1939), pp 51–63 Castrén, ZöV, xi (1943), pp 325–417 Whiteman, Digest, 8, Ch XXIII Parry, BDIL, 6, pp 247–440 McNair, Opinions, ii, pp 113–37 Baxter and Sohn, AJ, 55 (1961), pp 545–84 (Draft Convention on the International Responsibility of States for Injuries to Aliens) Ryan in International Law in Australia (ed O'Connell, 1965), pp 483–91 McDougal, Lasswell and Chen, AJ, 70

---

[13] See GA Res 3465 (XXX) (1975); UNYB, 1977, pp 625–6; Weis, BY, 50 (1979), pp 151–71; Leduc, AFDI, 23 (1977), pp 221–67.

[14] See § 122. Provisions protecting states against subversive activities carried on against them by refugees in other states appear in, eg The Montevideo Treaty on Political Asylum and Refuge 1939, Ch II (AJ, 37 (1943), Suppl, p 99), the OAS Convention on Territorial Asylum 1954, Arts 7–9 (BFSP, 161 (1954), p 566); and the OAU Convention Concerning the Specific Aspects of Refugee Problems in Africa 1969, Art III (see § 399, n 25). See also Re Lechin et al, AD, 16 (1949), No 1. Article II.2 of the OAU Convention provides that the grant of asylum to refugees is a peaceful and humanitarian act and shall not be regarded as an unfriendly act; see also the penultimate recital in the preamble to the UN Declaration on Territorial Asylum 1967 (GA Res 2312 (XXII)), Art 1 of the OAS Convention, and para 3 of the Council of Europe Declaration on Territorial Asylum 1977 (European YB, 25 (1977), p 351).

3127

Document printed from the ICRC web site on the 01.10.2012

Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Protocol I), 8 June 1977.

Commentary
Part IV : Civilian population #Section I -- General protection against effects of hostilities #Chapter II -- Civilians and civilian population
Art. 51 - Protection of the civilian population

[p.613] Article 51 -- Protection of the civilian population

[p.615] General remarks

1923 Article 51 is one of the most important articles in the Protocol. It explicitly confirms the customary rule that innocent civilians must be kept outside hostilities as far as possible and enjoy general protection against danger arising from hostilities. This general rule is accompanied by rules of application.

1924 Committee III of the Diplomatic Conference began examining this article in 1974 and referred it, with the ten amendments which had been submitted, to a Working Group. Committee III adopted the text of this article by consensus. Voting took place in a plenary meeting in 1977 and the article was adopted with 77 votes in favour, 1 against and 16 abstentions. (1)

1925 The delegation which voted against justified its vote by arguing that the article could seriously hinder the conduct of military operations against an invader and compromise the exercise of the right to self-defence recognized in Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations. According to this delegation, the provisions relating to indiscriminate attacks should not be such as to prevent a State from defending its territory against an invader, even if this were to entail losses in its own population. Several delegations made similar statements. (2)

1926 Such fears do not seem justified. Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations reads as follows:

"Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security [...]"

1927 However, it seems clear that the right of self-defence does not include the use of measures which would be contrary to international humanitarian law, even in a case where aggression has been established and recognized as such by the Security Council. The Geneva Conventions of 1949 and this Protocol must be applied in accordance with their Article 1 "in all circumstances"; the Preamble of the Protocol reaffirms that their application must be "without any adverse [p.616] distinction based on the nature or origin of the armed conflict or on the causes espoused by or attributed to the Parties to the conflict".

1928 It is true that in the preparatory work and during the discussions in the Diplomatic Conference the possibility was referred to of making a distinction between the rules applicable by an aggressor, on the one hand, and by the victim of the aggression, on the other. (3) However, several delegations opposed this point of view. (4) In any case, the Conference did not adopt this suggestion; on the contrary, in the above-mentioned paragraph of the Preamble of the Protocol it confirmed the equality of the Parties to the conflict with regard to the obligations laid down by humanitarian law. This is wholly reasonable, as the distinction between 'jus ad bellum' and 'jus in bello' is fundamental and should always be respected.

1929 Several delegations made spoken or written statements, during the final debate, on the meaning to be given to some of the provisions contained in this article. They will be examined with regard to the paragraphs concerned.

1930 In the draft the ICRC had provided that Article 51 (46 of the draft) would be among the provisions to which no reservations could be made. Finally the Conference deleted all provisions relating to reservations, but in the discussions Article 51 had been included in the list of articles to which reservations were prohibited. (5) In the absence of a specific provision it is therefore general international law that applies, in particular the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (Articles 19-23). It may be recalled that that Convention prohibits reservations which are incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty. (6)

1931 During the course of the discussions and in the written statements some delegations indicated that in their view reservations to this article would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty. (7) There is no doubt that, as stated above, Article 51 is a key article in the Protocol. It constitutes a reasonable balance which was achieved with difficulty between the divergent views that emerged in the Diplomatic Conference. That is why reservations, even partial ones, could jeopardize this balance and in this way go against the object and purpose of this indispensable provision.

1932 The importance attached by the Diplomatic Conference to this article is corroborated by the fact that violation of several of its provisions is qualified as a grave breach. In fact Article 85 ' (Repression of breaches of this Protocol), ' paragraph 3, qualifies as a grave breach the act of wilfully making the civilian population or individual civilians the object of attack if this causes death or serious injury to body or health.

1933 The same applies for wilful indiscriminate attacks affecting the civilian population or civilian objects (or against installations containing dangerous [p.617] forces in the knowledge that such an attack will cause excessive loss of life, injury to civilians or damage to civilian objects, as defined in Article 57 ' (Precautions in attack), ' paragraph 2(a)(iii).

1934 Thus in relation to criminal law the Protocol requires intent and, moreover, with regard to indiscriminate attacks, the element of prior knowledge of the predictable result.

Paragraph 1

1935 This is an introductory paragraph which confirms the principle of the general protection of civilians against dangers arising from military operations. There is no doubt that armed conflicts entail dangers for the civilian population, but these should be reduced to a minimum. Such is the aim of the following paragraphs.

1936 According to dictionaries, the term "military operations", which is also used in several other articles in the Protocol, means all the movements and activities carried out by armed forces related to hostilities. (8) A mixed group of the Diplomatic Conference gave the following definition of the expression "zone of military operations": "in an armed conflict, the territory where the armed forces of the adverse Parties taking a direct or an indirect part in current military operations, are located". (9)

1937 The second sentence refers to the "other applicable rules of international law": (10) apart from some customary rules and, of course, the other relevant provisions of the Protocol, these are mainly the Hague Regulations annexed to Hague Convention IV of 1907 and the fourth Geneva Convention of 1949. In addition, mention could be made of the rules contained in the Geneva Protocol of 1925 for the Prohibition of the Use of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or Other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare, as well as the Hague Convention of 1954 for the Protection of Cultural Property. Although they are not aimed directly at the protection of the civilian population, these two treaties can have a positive influence on the fate of the civilian population in time of armed conflict. The Convention concluded in 1980 on the Prohibition or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons contains corresponding provisions with respect to the civilian population. (11)

[p.618] Paragraph 2

1938 The first sentence gives substance to the principle of general immunity formulated in the preceding paragraph by explicitly prohibiting attacks directed against the civilian population as such, as well as against individual civilians. By using the words "directed" and "as such" it emphasizes that the population must never be used as a target or as a tactical objective.

1939 It should be noted that "attacks" are defined in Article 49 ' (Definition of attacks and scope of application), ' paragraph 1.

1940 In the second sentence the Conference wished to indicate that the prohibition covers acts intended to spread terror; there is no doubt that acts of violence related to a state of war almost always give rise to some degree of terror among the population and sometimes also among the armed forces. It also happens that attacks on armed forces are purposely conducted brutally in order to intimidate the enemy soldiers and persuade them to surrender. This is not the sort of terror envisaged here. (12) This provision is intended to prohibit acts of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population without offering substantial military advantage. It is interesting to note that threats of such acts are also prohibited. This calls to mind some of the proclamations made in the past threatening the annihilation of civilian populations.

1941 Finally, it is worthy of note that Article 85 ' (Repression of breaches of this Protocol), ' paragraph 3(a), defines the act of making the civilian population or individual civilians the object of attack as a grave breach, when it results in death or serious injury to body or health.

Paragraph 3

1942 The immunity afforded individual civilians is subject to an overriding condition, namely, on their abstaining from all hostile acts. Hostile acts should be understood to be acts which by their nature and purpose are intended to cause actual harm to the personnel and equipment of the armed forces. Thus a civilian who takes part in armed combat, either individually or as part of a group, thereby becomes a legitimate target, though only for as long as he takes part in hostilities. If the civilian is captured while he is committing hostile acts, the rules governing his fate are laid down in Article 45 ' (Protection of persons who have taken part in hostilities). '

1943 During the course of the discussions several delegations indicated that the expression "hostilities" used in this article included preparations for combat and the return from combat. (13) Similar problems arose in Article 44 ' (Combatants and prisoners of war) ' with regard to the expression "military deployment preceding the launching of an attack". It seems that the word "hostilities" covers not only the time that the civilian actually makes use of a weapon, but also, for example, [p.619] the time that he is carrying it, as well as situations in which he undertakes hostile acts without using a weapon. If a civilian is captured or arrested in such circumstances, he may have recourse to paragraph 1 of Article 45 ' (Protection of persons who have taken part in hostilities) ' and claim prisoner-of-war status; he must be treated as such pending determination of his status by a competent tribunal.

1944 What is the exact meaning of the term "direct" in the expression "take a direct part in hostilities"? A similar expression is already used in paragraph 2 of Article 43 ' (Armed forces). ' In general the immunity afforded civilians is subject to a very stringent condition: that they do not participate directly in hostilities, i.e., that they do not become combatants, on pain of losing their protection. Thus "direct" participation means acts of war which by their nature or purpose are likely to cause actual harm to the personnel and equipment of the enemy armed forces. It is only during such participation that a civilian loses his immunity and becomes a legitimate target. Once he ceases to participate, the civilian regains his right to the protection under this Section, i.e., against the effects of hostilities, and he may no longer be attacked. However, there is nothing to prevent the authorities, capturing him in the act or arresting him at a later stage, from taking repressive or punitive security measures with regard to him in accordance with the provisions of Article 45 ' (Protection of persons who have taken part in hostilities) ' or on the basis of the provisions of the fourth Convention (assigned residence, internment etc.) if his civilian status is recognized. Further it may be noted that members of the armed forces feigning civilian non-combatant status are guilty of perfidy under Article 37 ' (Prohibition of perfidy), ' paragraph 1(c).

1945 There should be a clear distinction between direct participation in hostilities and participation in the war effort. The latter is often required from the population as a whole to various degrees. Without such a distinction the efforts made to reaffirm and develop international humanitarian law could become meaningless. In fact, in modern conflicts, many activities of the nation contribute to the conduct of hostilities, directly or indirectly; even the morale of the population plays a role in this context.

Paragraph 4

1946 This provision is very important; it confirms the unlawful character of certain regrettable practices during the Second World War and subsequent armed conflicts. Far too often the purpose of attacks was to destroy all life in a particular area or to raze a town to the ground without this resulting, in most cases, in any substantial military advantages.

1947 On this subject the general rule was formulated in Article 48 ' (Basic rule): ' belligerents may direct their operations only against military objectives. The first specification is added in paragraph 2 of the present Article 51 [1]: attacks against the civilian population as such and against individual civilians are prohibited.

1948 Up to now the matter is fairly clear in theory, but it is less so in practice. In fact, civilians may be inside or in the immediate proximity of military objectives, whether these consist of persons or objects; moreover, purely civilian objects may in combat conditions become military objectives, thereby endangering the [p.620] persons near them. Paragraphs 4 and 5 attempt to cover such situations. The need to achieve a consensus has led those drafting these provisions to formulate them in a way that is sometimes ambiguous. Several delegates remarked on this when the article was adopted. (14)

1949 At a more general level, other delegations pointed out that, like the whole of the Section, this provision should not be such as to inhibit the capacity for defence of a State which has to counter aggression. Yet it is well-known how difficult it is in armed conflict to determine objectively who is the aggressor. Moreover, it should be recalled that the State which is a victim of aggression is in no way exempted from the obligations incumbent upon it under treaty or customary rules of law.

1950 The provision begins with a general prohibition on indiscriminate attacks, i.e., attacks in which no distinction is made. Some may think that this general rule should have sufficed, but the Conference considered that it should define the three types of attack covered by the general expression "indiscriminate attacks".

' Sub-paragraph (a) '

1951 This refers in the first place to attacks which are not directed at a specific military objective. Article 52 [1] ' (General protection of civilian objects), ' paragraph 2, defines military objectives, as far as objects are concerned, limiting them "to those objects which by their nature, location, purpose or use make an effective contribution to military action and whose total or partial destruction, capture or neutralization, in the circumstances ruling at the time, offers a definite military advantage".

Obviously military objectives also include, indeed principally so, the armed forces, their members, installations, equipment and transports.

1952 The military character of an objective can sometimes be recognized visually, but most frequently those who give the order or take the decision to attack will do so on information provided by the competent services of the army. In the majority of cases they will not themselves have the opportunity to check the accuracy of such information; they should at least make sure that the information is precise and recent, and that the precautions and restrictions laid down in Article 57 [1] ' (Precautions in attack) ' are observed. In case of doubt, additional information must be requested.

1953 The armed forces and their installations are objectives that may be attacked wherever they are, except when the attack could incidentally result in loss of human life among the civilian population, injuries to civilians, and damage to civilian objects which would be excessive in relation to the expected direct and specific military advantage. In combat areas (15) it often happens that purely civilian [p.621] buildings or installations are occupied or used by the armed forces and such objectives may be attacked, provided that this does not result in excessive losses among the civilian population. For example, it is clear that if fighting between armed forces takes place in a town which is defended house by house, these buildings -- for which Article 52 [1] ' (General protection of civilian objects), ' paragraph 3, lays down a presumption regarding their civilian use -- will inevitably become military objectives because they offer a definite contribution to the military action. However, this is still subject to the prohibition of an attack causing excessive civilian losses.

1954 Outside the combat area the military character of objectives that are to be attacked must be clearly established and verified. Similarly the limits of such objectives must be precisely determined.

1955 The question arose what the situation would be if a belligerent in a combat area wished to prevent the enemy army from establishing itself in a particular area or from passing through that area, for example, by means of barrage fire. There can be little doubt in such a case that the area must be considered as a military objective and treated as such. Yet, during the Diplomatic Conference several delegations insisted on confirming this interpretation in their statements. (16) Of course, such a situation could only concern limited areas and not vast stretches of territory. It applies primarily to narrow passages, bridgeheads or strategic points such as hills or mountain passes.

' Sub-paragraph (b) '

1956 This concerns attacks which employ a method or means of combat which cannot be directed at a specific military objective. (17)

1957 The term "means of combat" or "means of warfare" (cf. Article 35 [1] -- ' Basic rules ') generally refers to the weapons being used, while the expression "methods of combat" generally refers to the way in which such weapons are used.

1958 As regards the weapons, those relevant here are primarily long-range missiles which cannot be aimed exactly at the objective. The V2 rockets used at the end of the Second World War are an example of this. It should be noted that most armies endeavour to use accurate weapons as attacks which do not strike the intended objective result in a loss of time and equipment without giving a corresponding advantage. Thereby the margin of error of missiles is gradually reduced. Here, military interests and humanitarian requirements coincide.

1959 From the point of view of the protection of civilians, the use of land or sea mines raises some problems. There were lengthy discussions in the Ad Hoc Committee on Conventional Weapons of the Conference. The work of this Committee (18) served as a basis for the Conference convened by the United [p.622] Nations in 1979 and 1980. That Conference adopted a Convention (10 October 1980) and three Protocols, one of which was on the prohibition or restrictions on the use of mines, booby-traps and other devices. (19) Briefly, this Protocol requires Parties to take measures to keep adequate records and to give proper warning when minefields are laid, so that the population is not endangered. As regards mine-laying by aircraft or remotely-delivered mines, such operations are prohibited in principle unless such mines are only used in an area that constitutes a military objective or that contains military objectives; even in that situation the location of mines that are laid must be recorded, or the mines must be equipped with a remotely-controlled mechanism to detonate then or must self-destruct when they have lost their military value. (20)

1960 However, the question may arise at what point the use of mines constitutes an attack in the sense of this provision. Is it when the mine is laid, when it is armed, when a person is endangered by it, or when it finally explodes? The participants at the meeting of the International Society of Military Law and the Law of War (Lausanne, 1982) conceded that from the legal point of view the use of mines constituted an attack in the sense of the Protocol when a person was directly endangered by such a mine. (21) It may be considered that mines also come within the scope of sub-paragraph (c) discussed below.

' Sub-paragraph (c) '

1961 This sub-paragraph concerns attacks which employ a method or means of combat the effects of which cannot be limited as required by this Protocol. Like sub-paragraph (b) this provision was not contained in such a precise manner in the ICRC draft; the Working Group of Committee III presented a more elaborate text which was referred back to the Working Group, and finally Committee III adopted an article which contains all the elements of the present article (22) although the wording has been revised and modified reasonably successfully by the Drafting Committee of the Conference.

1962 On this provision the report of Committee III contains the following passage:

"The main problem was that of defining the term ' indiscriminate attacks '. There was general agreement that a proper definition would include the act of not directing an attack at a military objective, the use of means or methods of combat which cannot be directed at a specific military objective, and the use of means or methods of combat the effects of which cannot be limited as required by the Protocol. Many but not all of those who commented were of the view that the definition was not intended to mean that there are means [p.623] or methods of combat whose use would involve an indiscriminate attack in all circumstances. Rather it was intended to take account of the fact that means or methods of combat which can be used perfectly legitimately in some situations could, in other circumstances, have effects that would be contrary to some limitations contained in the Protocol, in which event their use in those circumstances would involve an indiscriminate attack." (23)

1963 However, there are some means of warfare of which the effects cannot be limited in any circumstances. It is different with regard to other means, such as fire (24) or water (25) which, depending on the circumstances of their use, can have either a restricted effect or, on the contrary, be completely out of the control of those using them, causing significant losses among the civilian population and extensive damage to civilian objects. The nature of the means used is not the only criterion: the power of the weapons used can have the same consequences. For example, if a 10 ton bomb is used to destroy a single building, it is inevitable that the effects will be very extensive and will annihilate or damage neighbouring buildings, while a less powerful missile would suffice to destroy the building. There are also methods which by their very nature have an indiscriminate character, such as poisoning wells.

1964 Several delegations considered that it was necessary to confirm the views expressed by the Rapporteur (26) in their explanations of vote. According to these delegations the provision does not mean that there are means of combat of which the use would constitute an indiscriminate attack in all circumstances.

1965 This point was discussed above; it is true that in most cases the indiscriminate character of an attack does not depend on the nature of the weapons concerned, but on the way in which they are used. However, as stated above, there are some weapons which by their very nature have an indiscriminate effect. The example of bacteriological means of warfare is an obvious illustration of this point. There are also other weapons which have similar indiscriminate effects, such as poisoning sources of drinking water. Of course, bacteriological means of warfare have been prohibited since 1925, and the use of poison was prohibited in 1899 by the Hague Regulations.

1966 Nevertheless, States in making such statements were more concerned with nuclear weapons. A thorough analysis of the connection between the Protocol and the use that may be made of nuclear weapons is included in the introduction to this Section, and we refer the reader to that text. (27)

Paragraph 5

1967 The attacks which form the subject of this paragraph fall under the general prohibition of indiscriminate attacks laid down at the beginning of paragraph 4. Two types of attack in particular are envisaged here.

[p.624] 1968 The 'first type' includes area bombardment, sometimes known as carpet bombing or saturation bombing. It is characteristic of such bombing that it destroys all life in a specific area and razes to the ground all buildings situated there. There were many examples of such bombing during the Second World War, and also during some more recent conflicts. Such types of attack have given rise to strong public criticism in many countries, and it is understandable that the drafters of the Protocol wished to mention it specifically, even though such attacks already fall under the general prohibition contained in paragraph 4. According to the report of Committee III, the expression "bombardment by any method or means" means all attacks by fire-arms or projectiles (except for direct fire by small arms) and the use of any type of projectile. (28)

1969 This paragraph was adopted with some difficulty; the expression "clearly separated and distinct" in particular led to lengthy discussions. In their first report the Working Group had given Committee III a choice between various proposals: "widely separated", "distinct"; or alternatively the introduction of a final phrase, "unless the objectives are too close together to be capable of being attacked separately". (29)

1970 Rather than going on to vote on these various proposals, Committee III decided to refer the subject back to the Working Group and requested it to try and come up with an expression that might meet with general approval. The Group presented the Committee with a new draft which had been accepted by consensus within the Group. (30) Committee III adopted this proposal without further discussion and it forms the present text of paragraph 5.

1971 It will be noted that the Conference adopted a wording very similar to that which the ICRC had proposed, namely, "at some distance from each other". It was decided not to add the phrase cited above, no doubt through fear of encouraging area bombardment, for in such a case the attacking forces could use their own judgment, taking into account the weapons available and the circumstances, as to whether the individual objectives were too close together to be attacked separately.

1972 Having said that, the interpretation of the words "clearly separated and distinct" leaves some degree of latitude to those mounting an attack; in case of doubt they can refer to sub-paragraph (b) and assess whether the attack is of a nature to cause losses and damage which would be excessive in relation to the military advantage anticipated.

1973 The question may also arise whether the prohibition formulated here is not already covered by paragraph 4(a), which prohibits attacks not directed at a specific military objective. In fact, areas of land between military objectives are not themselves military objectives. It must be accepted that in open areas which are sparsely populated, such as forests, attacks may be mounted against the whole of the area if it has been established that enemy armed forces are present. On the other hand, in a town, village or any other area where there is a similar [p.625] concentration of civilian persons and objects, the military objectives in that area may only be attacked separately without leading to civilian losses outside the military objectives themselves. This also applies for temporary concentrations of civilians, such as refugee camps.

1974 As stated above, the size of the area over which military objectives are spread and the distance separating them are relatively subjective notions. In case of doubt, the general rule of respect for the civilian population must always be observed.

1975 When the distance separating two military objectives is sufficient for them to be attacked separately, taking into account the means available, the rule should be fully applied. However, even if the distance is insufficient, excessive losses that might result from the attack should be taken into account.

1976 The ' second type of attack ' envisaged in paragraph 5 includes those which have excessive effects in relation to the concrete and direct military advantage anticipated. Once again there were long discussions in the Diplomatic Conference and it was difficult to come to an agreement. The formula that was adopted is very similar to that proposed by the ICRC. (31) It is based on the wording of Article 57 ' (Precautions in attack) ' relating to precautionary measures. Committee III had suggested either a straightforward reference to Article 57 ' (Precautions in attack) ' or reproducing the formula used in that article. Finally, the Drafting Committee, which was requested to resolve the question, opted for the second solution. Thus reference may be made to Article 57 ' (Precautions in attack) ' for further details.

1977 Paragraphs 4 and 5 were criticized in the Diplomatic Conference and subsequently. The criticism was directed particularly at the imprecise wording and terminology. For example, according to some, the Protocol fails to specify the size of the area over which military objectives may be spread and the distance which must separate them. It was also pointed out that modern electronic means made it possible to locate military objectives, but that they did not provide information on the presence of civilian elements within or in the vicinity of such objectives.

1978 Such criticisms are justified, at least to some extent. Putting these provisions into practice, or, for that matter, any others in Part IV, will require complete good faith on the part of the belligerents, as well as the desire to conform with the general principle of respect for the civilian population.

1979 Comments were also made in various quarters that paragraph 5(b) authorized any type of attack, provided that this did not result in losses or damage which were excessive in relation to the military advantage anticipated. This theory is manifestly incorrect. In order to comply with the conditions, the attack must be directed against a military objective with means which are not disproportionate in relation to the objective, but are suited to destroying only that objective, and the effects of the attacks must be limited in the way required by the Protocol; ' moreover, ' even after those conditions are fulfilled, the incidental civilian losses [p.626] and damages must not be excessive. Of course, the disproportion between losses and damages caused and the military advantages anticipated raises a delicate problem; in some situations there will be no room for doubt, while in other situations there may be reason for hesitation. In such situations the interests of the civilian population should prevail, as stated above.

1980 The idea has also been put forward that even if they are very high, civilian losses and damages may be justified if the military advantage at stake is of great importance. This idea is contrary to the fundamental rules of the Protocol; in particular it conflicts with Article 48 ' (Basic rule) ' and with paragraphs 1 and 2 of the present Article 51 . The Protocol does not provide any justification for attacks which cause extensive civilian losses and damages. Incidental losses and damages should never be extensive.

1981 This clearly shows the importance attached by the drafters of the Protocol to this article; these provisions should therefore lead those responsible for such attacks to take all necessary precautions before making their decision, even in the difficult constraints of battle conditions.

Paragraph 6

1982 This provision is very important. In fact, the belligerents in the Second World War recognized in their public declarations that attacks may be directed only at military objectives, but on the pretext that their own population had been hit by attacks carried out by the adversary, they went so far, by way of reprisals, as to wage war almost indiscriminately, and this resulted in countless civilian victims. (32)

1983 The text is that proposed by the ICRC. During the discussions in the Conference the question of reprisals was examined with regard to several articles and in each of these a clause prohibiting reprisals was included (see also Articles 20 -- ' Prohibition of reprisals; ' 52 , ' General protection of civilian objects; ' 53 -- ' Protection of cultural objects and of places of worship; ' 54 -- ' Protection of objects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population; ' 55 -- ' Protection of the natural environment ' and 56 -- ' Protection of works and installations containing dangerous forces). ' This is why several delegates raised the question during the discussions whether a single general provision might not suffice, while others considered that it was not very realistic to prohibit all reprisals, and that it was better to try and restrain them by laying down specific rules. Finally Committee I was charged with examining the general problem. (33) It decided to leave the specific clauses prohibiting reprisals in the articles where they occured, and not to draft a general prohibition. (34)

1984 The prohibition contained in this article is not subject to any conditions and it therefore has a peremptory character; in particular it leaves out the possibility of derogating from this rule by invoking military necessity. As in the 1949 [p.627] Conventions, this provision confirms the right of an individual not to be punished for acts which he has not himself committed.

1985 This prohibition of attacks by way of reprisals and other prohibitions of the same type contained in the Protocol and in the Conventions have considerably reduced the scope for reprisals in time of war. At most, such measures could now be envisaged in the choice of weapons and in methods of combat used against military objectives.

Paragraph 7

1986 This provision affords measures of protection to the whole of the civilian population and all civilians, thus extending to them measures which already exist for two categories of persons: prisoners of war and civilians protected by the fourth Convention. In fact, according to Article 23 of the Third Convention, prisoners of war may not be used to render certain points or areas immune from military operations.

1987 As regards persons protected by the fourth Convention, Article 28 of the latter provides that they may not be used to render certain points or areas immune from military operations. Article 19 of the first Convention and Article 12 of the present Protocol ' (Protection of medical units) ' contain a similar rule with regard to medical units. For its part, Article 58 of the Protocol ' (Precautions against the effects of attack) ' also deals with measures to be taken to remove the population from the vicinity of military objectives, and we refer the reader to the commentary thereon.

1988 This paragraph develops and clarifies these various rules. The term "movements" in particular is a new one; this is intended to cover cases where the civilian population moves of its own accord. The second sentence concerns cases where the movement of the population takes place in accordance with instructions from the competent authorities, and is particularly concerned with movements ordered by an Occupying Power, although it certainly also applies to transfers of prisoners of war, and civilian enemy subjects ordered by the authorities of a belligerent Power to move within its own territory.

Paragraph 8

1989 The ICRC had proposed in its draft the following provision which related to the provision contained in paragraph 7:

"If a Party to the conflict, in violation of the foregoing provision, uses civilians with the aim of shielding military objectives from attack, the other Party to the conflict shall take the precautionary measures provided for in Article 50." (35)

[p.628] 1990 It is fairly clear from the deliberations and the report of Committee III (36) that the prohibitions referred to in paragraph 8 are those contained in paragraph 7. Military objectives are defined as far as objects are concerned in Article 52 ' (General protection of civilian objects), ' paragraph 2. Thus, even if civilians were intentionally brought or kept in the vicinity of military objectives, the attacker should take the measures provided for in Article 57 [] ' (Precautions in attack), ' especially those set out in paragraph 2 (a)(ii) and (iii) and (c). It is clear that in such cases a warning to the population is particularly appropriate as civilians are themselves rarely capable of assessing the danger in which they are placed.

1991 This provision is concerned with the situation in which other provisions of the Protocol are not complied with. It is an attempt to safeguard the population even when the appropriate authorities do not take the required measures of protection with regard to them.

1992 Article 60 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties provides that a material breach of a multilateral treaty entitles a Party especially affected by the breach to invoke it as a ground for suspending the operation of the treaty in whole or in part in the relations between itself and the defaulting State. Without even going into the question whether non-compliance with paragraph 7 constitutes a material breach of the Protocol, it is pleasing to note the tenor of the last paragraph of the same Article 60:

"5. Paragraphs 1 to 3 do not apply to provisions relating to the protection of the human person contained in treaties of a humanitarian character, in particular to provisions prohibiting any form of reprisals against persons protected by such treaties." (37)

1993 Thus, in the case of this Protocol, it is compulsory to apply it, even if another Party has committed a violation. It should be noted that provisions protecting the human person now bear the stamp of customary law.

' C.P./J.P. '

NOTES

(1) [(1) p.615] O.R. VI, pp. 165-166, CDDH/SR.41, para. 118;

(2) [(2) p.615] Ibid., p. 162. One delegation emphasized that the Charter of the United Nations recognizes the right of individual or collective self-defence in the case of armed attack and that international 1aw cannot restrict the legitimate right of a victim of aggression and occupation to defend itself (ibid., p. 196, Annex (Romania));

(3) [(3) p.616] See, for example, O.R. V, pp. 119-121, CDDH/SR.12, paras. 13-21, and O.R. VI, p. 196, CDDH/SR.41, Annex (Romania);

(4) [(4) p.616] See, for example, O.R. V, pp. 109-110, CDDH/SR.11, paras. 44-50; pp. 137-138, CDDH/SR.13, paras.51-57;

(5) [(5) p.616] O.R. X, p. 251, CDDH/405/Rev.1;

(6) [(6) p.616] Cf. introduction to Part VI, infra, p. 1061;

(7) [(7) p.616] O.R. VI, p. 167, CDDH/SR.41, paras. 135-137; p. 187, ibid., Annex (GDR); pp. 192-193 (Mexico);

(8) [(8) p.617] Cf. the definitions given supra, commentary Art. 48, note 13, p. 600;

(9) [(9) p.617] O.R. XV, p. 338, CDDH/II/266-CDDH/III/255, Annex A;

(10) [(10) p.617] We also refer to the commentary Art. 49, para. 4, supra, p. 606, and Art. 2, sub-para. (b), supra, p. 60;

(11) [(11) p.617] Convention of 10 October 1980 on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons which may be deemed to be Excessively Injurious or to have Indiscriminate Effects.
- Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Mines, Booby-Traps and Other Devices (Protocol II), Art. 3, paras. 2, 3(c) and 4; Art. 4, para. 2; Art. 5, para. 2; Art. 7, para. 3(a)(i).
- Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Incendiary Weapons (Protocol III), Art. 2. For participation in this Convention, cf. infra, p. 1549;

(12) [(12) p.618] O.R. XV, p. 274, CDDH/215/Rev.1, para. 51;

(13) [(13) p.618] Ibid., p. 330, CDDH /III/224;

(14) [(14) p.620] See, for example, O.R. VI, pp. 164-165, CDDH/SR.41, para. 122;

(15) [(15) p.620] The Mixed Group defined this concept as follows: "In an armed conflict, that area where the armed forces of the adverse Parties actually engaged in combat, and those directly supporting them, are located". O.R. XV, p. 338, CDDH/II/266-CDDH/III/255, Annex A;

(16) [(16) p.621] See commentary Art. 52, para. 2, infra, p. 635;

(17) [(17) p.621] A note on the drafting of the French text: the use of the pronoun "on" is unusual in French legal draftsmanship as it is rather indeterminate. This is avoided in the English wording where the word "attacks" is the subject of the sentence;

(18) [(18) p.621] See O.R. XVI;

(19) [(19) p.622] Cf. supra, note 11;

(20) [(20) p.622] Art. 5 of the above-mentioned Protocol II. Also see Y. Sandoz, "A New Step Forward in International Law -- Prohibition and Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons", ' IRRC, ' January-February 1981, p. 3 (offprint available with the text of the Final Act of the said United Nations Conference, originally published ibid., pp. 41-55);

(21) [(21) p.622] See "Forces armées et développement du droit de la guerre", op.cit., p. 303;

(22) [(22) p.622] O.R. XV pp. 304-305, CDDH/215/Rev.1, Annex;

(23) [(23) p.623] Ibid., p. 274, para. 55;

(24) [(24) p.623] Cf. the Protocol II referred to supra, note 11;

(25) [(25) p.623] On this subject reference may be made to Article 56 of this Protocol;

(26) [(26) p.623] See O.R. VI, pp. 168-172, CDDH/SR.41;

(27) [(27) p.623] See supra, p. 589;

(28) [(28) p.624] Cf. O.R. XV, p. 275, CDDH/215/Rev.1, para. 56;

(29) [(29) p.624] Ibid, p. 329, CDDH/III/224;

(30) [(30) p.624] O.R. XIV, p. 30, CDDH/III/SR.31, para. 5;

(31) [(31) p.625] "to launch attacks which may be expected to entail incidental losses among the civilian population and cause the destruction of civilian objects to an extent disproportionate to the direct and substantial military advantage anticipated" (draft, Art. 46, para. 3 (b));

(32) [(32) p.626] Cf. G. Best, ' Humanity in Warfare, ' London, 1980, pp. 273-277;

(33) [(33) p.626] O.R. XIV, p. 414, CDDH/III/SR.38, para. 65; O.R. V, p. 375, CDDH/SR.31, paras. 20-23; O.R. X, pp. 184-185, CDDH/405/Rev.1, paras. 21-30;

(34) [(34) p.626] On the general question of reprisals, cf. infra, p. 981, introduction to Part V, Section II;

(35) [(35) p.627] Now Art. 57 of the Protocol;

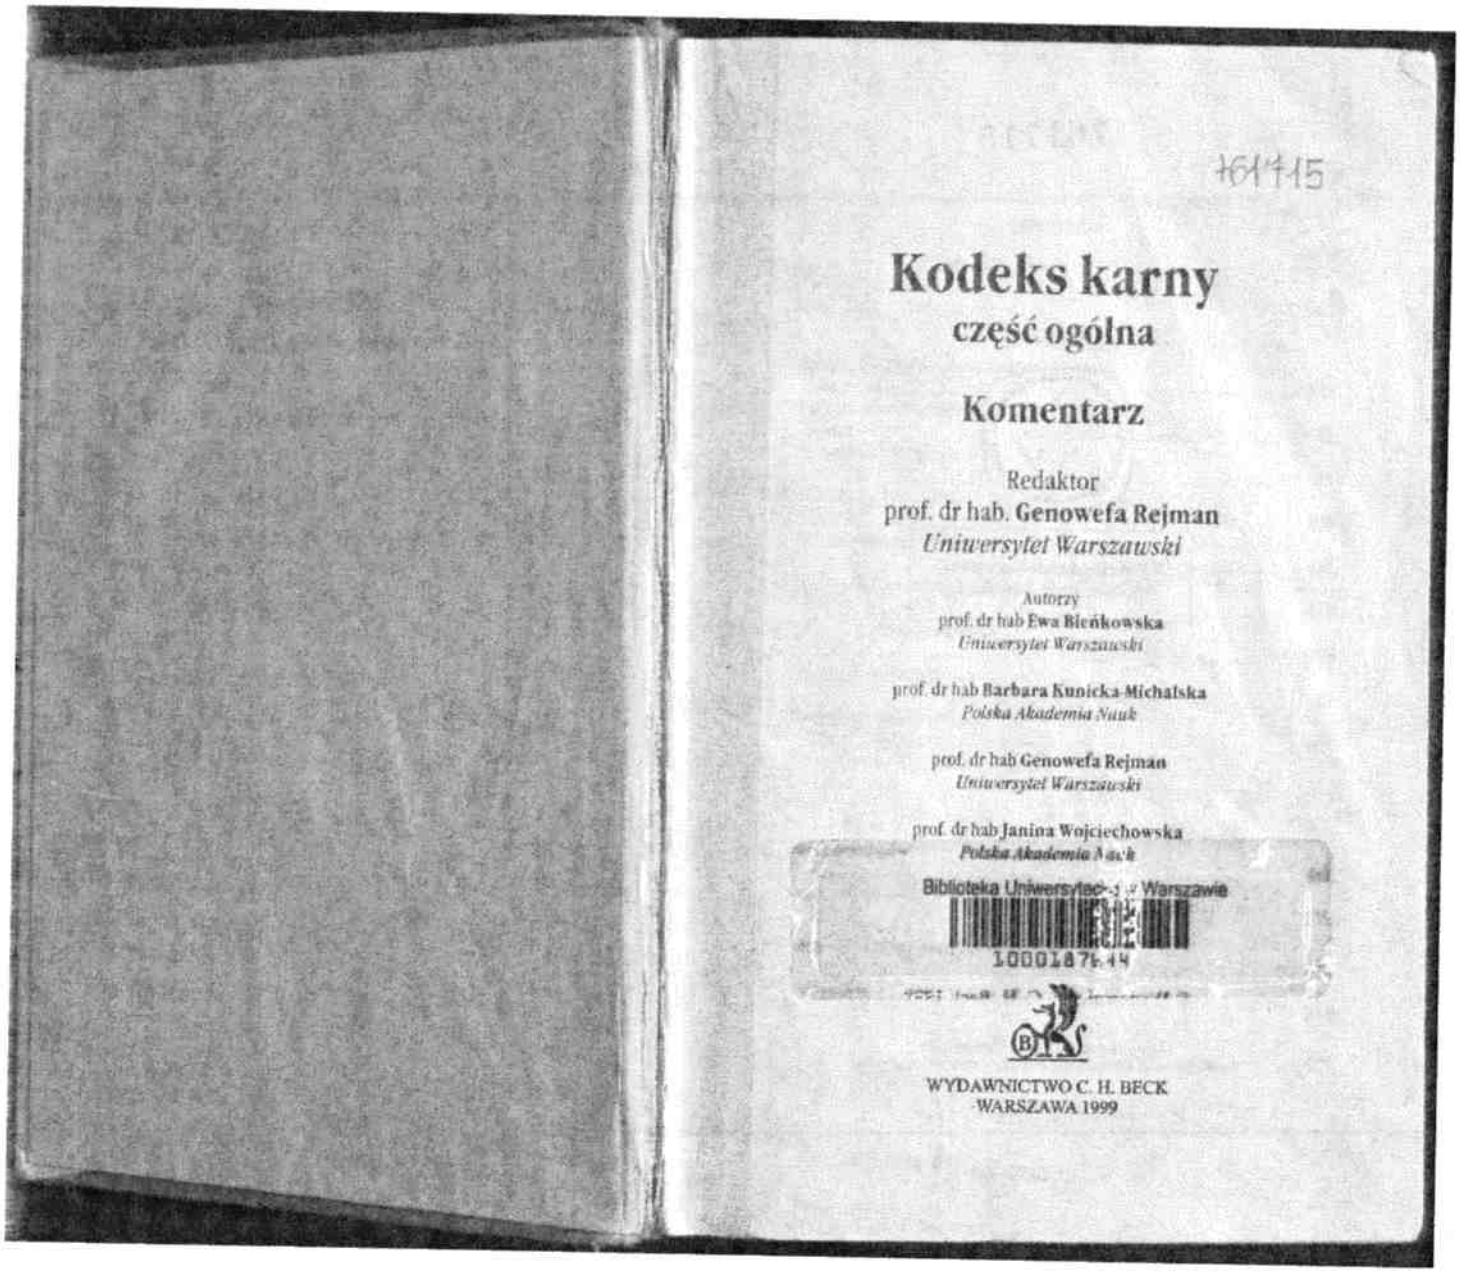
(36) [(36) p.628] O.R. XV, p. 275, CDDH/215/Rev.1, para. 59;

(37) [(37) p.628] For more details, see commentary Art. 1, para. 1, supra p. 34, and the introduction to Part V, Section II (section concerning reprisals), infra, p. 981;

5765

3139

5766



161715

Kodeks karny
część ogólna

Komentarz

Redaktor
prof. dr hab. Genowefa Rejman
Uniwersytet Warszawski

Autorzy
prof. dr hab Ewa Bieńkowska
Uniwersytet Warszawski

prof. dr hab Barbara Kunicka-Michalska
Polska Akademia Nauk

prof. dr hab Genowefa Rejman
Uniwersytet Warszawski

prof. dr hab Janina Wojciechowska
Polska Akademia Nauk

Biblioteka Uniwersytecka w Warszawie
1000187644

WYDAWNICTWO C. H. BECK
WARSZAWA 1999

3140

Stanowisko to jest zgodne z kodeksowymi zasadami określającymi podstawy odpowiedzialności karnej za podżeganie i pomocnictwo. Polskie prawo karne wprowadza tzw. zasadę indywidualizacji, w której nie posuwa się aż tak daleko, aby uzasadniać karalność za samo nakłanianie w oderwaniu od czynu przestępnego objętego treścią nakłaniania. Kodeks w sposób wyraźny wiąże odpowiedzialność za podżeganie ze znamionami przestępstwa rodzajowego. Nakłanianie stanowi więc samodzielną podstawę odpowiedzialności karnej tylko o tyle, o ile chodzi o sprecyzowanie ogólnych warunków karalności (wina, wiek, poczytalność, recydywa itp.). Na tym kończy się jednak samodzielność instytucji podżegania. Podżeganie jest związane z rodzajowymi cechami przestępstwa przez to, że stanowi ono szczególną jego postać i formę dokonania (S. Śliwiński, Polskie ..., s. 336).

Nakłanianie może polegać nie tylko na bezpośrednim oddziaływaniu na sprawcę głównego; – podżeganie za pośrednictwem osób trzecich jest możliwe zarówno pod względem prawnym, jak i życiowym.

80 2. Różnica pomiędzy podżeganiem a kierowaniem przestępstwem innej osoby polega na tym, że w pierwszym wypadku sprawca kończy swą rolę w momencie wywołania u innej osoby zamiaru popełnienia przestępstwa, a w drugim, gdy chodzi o sprawstwo kierownicze akcent nie jest położony na wywoływaniu zamiaru u drugiej osoby. Sprawstwo kierowane może objawić się po podjęciu zamiaru przestępstwa u innej osoby, jeżeli tylko w jego ramach zostaną podjęte czynności przygotowujące tę czynność, która zabezpiecza warunki wykonania przestępstwa i bezpieczeństwo wykonawców czynu zabronionego. Sprawstwo kierownicze trwa przez cały czas dokonywania czynności przestępnych, a także po ich zakończeniu, gdy np. decyduje o rozmieszczeniu korzyści pochodzących z przestępstwa.

81 3. Różnica pomiędzy podżeganiem a poleceniem wykonania czynu zabronionego osobie od siebie uzależnionej wyraża się także tym, że nie kończy się ono z chwilą wydania polecenia wywołującego postanowienie popełnienia przestępstwa u osoby pod adresem, której polecenie zostało sformułowane.

W zależności od podporządkowania się takiemu poleceniu lub nie, sprawca taki oddziaływuje w sposób negatywny na tę osobę, którą w postaci polecenia zmusza do wykonania czynu zabronionego. Jest to sprawstwo bardziej rozwinięte od strony przedmiotowej, bo obok wywołania zamiaru, wprowadza osobę, do której zwrócone jest polecenie, w stan psychicznego niepokoju lub nawet przymusu.

VI. Pomocnictwo

A. Pomocnictwo – określenie

82 1. Pomocnictwo w nowym Kodeksie karnym zostało ujęte w nowej formie. Jest to rozbudowana formuła, odbiegająca od tej znanej uchylonemu Kodeksowi karnemu z 1969 r. (art.18 § 2). Do zasadniczych zmian należy

a) Określenie umyślności pomocnictwa w postaci zamiaru, podczas gdy uchylony kodeks wyraźnie stwierdzał, że pomocnictwa można dopuścić się także w formie zamiaru ewentualnego. Obecnie problem ten będzie dyskusyjny. Ustawodawca w sposób wyraźny nie wprowadza zamiaru ewentualnego do podmiotowych znamion pomocnictwa. Wprawdzie wykładnia systemowa, nawiązująca do definicji podżegania może doprowadzić do wniosku wskazującego na to, że jeżeli ustawodawca sprowadza tę postać popełnienia przestępstwa do zamiaru bezpośredniego w sposób wyraźny, a w przypadku pomocnictwa ustawodawca operuje tylko pojęciem zamiaru, oznacza to, że w równym stopniu dotyczy to zamiaru ewentualnego. Wykładnia taka jest możliwa, ale nie przesądzająca. Wprawdzie w uzasadnieniu Komisji kodyfikacyjnej jest mowa o zamiarze ewentualnym przy pomocnictwie, to jednak liczy się tekst ustawy, a nie uzasadnienie.

b) Kodeks w sposób wyraźny wprowadza postać tzw. pomocnictwa fizycznego, przez wskazanie na czym ono może polegać i pomocnictwa psychicznego. W jednym i drugim wypadku pomoc polega na ułatwianiu popełnienia sprawcy przestępstwa.

c) Zasadniczą różnicą pomiędzy konstrukcją prezentowaną w KK z 1969 r. i art.18 § 3 KK z 1997 r. jest wyraźne stwierdzenie, że pomoc może polegać także na zaniechaniu wykonania obowiązku i ułatwieniu w ten sposób popełnienia przestępstwa innej osobie.

83 2. W uzasadnieniu Komisji kodyfikacyjnej (s.13) czytamy co następuje: „Projekt w tym samym artykule, w którym określa sprawstwo, wprowadza określenia podżegania i pomocnictwa, co ma jeszcze bardziej podkreślić charakter zjawiskowy tych postaci czynu zabronionego.

Nie przewiduje się zmiany określenia podżegania. Proponuje się natomiast inne ujęcie pomocnictwa. W określeniu zawartym w projekcie odrzuca się dopuszczoną przez Kodeks karny z 1969 r. tzw. wewnętrzną analogię. Projekt przyjmuje także wyraźnie pomocnictwo przez zaniechanie, warunkując je jednak tym, aby dopuszczający się zaniechania miał szczególny obowiązek niedopuszczenia do czynu zabronionego. Chodzi tu o taki sam obowiązek i pochodzący z tych samych źródeł, jaki uzasadnia przyjęcie odpowiedzialności za skutek w przypadku odpowiedzialności zaniechania. Strona podmiotowa obu odmian pomocnictwa (z działania i z zaniechania) jest taka sama i może polegać na zamiarze bezpośrednim lub na zamiarze wynikowym."

3141

576

Otto Triffterer (Ed.)

Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court

Observers' Notes, Article by Article

Second Edition

C.H. Beck · Hart · Nomos

3142

5769

Published by Verlag C.H.Beck oHG, Wilhelmstraße 9, 80801 München, Germany, eMail: bestellung@beck.de

Co-published by Hart Publishing, 16C Worcester Place, Oxford, OX1 2JW, United Kingdom, eMail: hartpub.co.uk

and

Nomos Verlagsgesellschaft mbH & Co. KG, Waldseestraße 3-5,
76530 Baden-Baden, Germany, eMail: nomos@nomos.de

Published in North America (US and Canada) by Hart Publishing, c/o International Specialized Book Services, 930 NE 58th Avenue, Suite 300, Portland, OR 97213-3786, USA, eMail: orders@isbs.com

ISBN 978-3-406-57841-0 (Verlag C.H.Beck)
ISBN 978-1-84113-888-6 (Hart Publishing)
ISBN 978-3-8329-0927-7 (Nomos)

© 2008 Verlag C.H.Beck oHG
Wilhelmstr. 9, 80801 München

Printed in Germany by
Kösel GmbH & Co. KG,
Am Buchweg 1, 87452 Altusried-Krugzell

Typeset by the Editor

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, without the prior permission of Verlag C.H.Beck, or as expressly permitted by law under the terms agreed with the appropriate reprographic rights organisation. Enquiries concerning reproduction which may not be covered by the above should be addressed to Verlag C.H.Beck at the address above.

3143

Article 67
Rights of the accused

1. In the determination of any charge, the accused shall be entitled to a public hearing, having regard to the provisions of this Statute, to a fair hearing conducted impartially, and to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality:

(a) To be informed promptly and in detail of the nature, cause and content of the charge, in a language which the accused fully understands and speaks;

(b) To have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of the defence and to communicate freely with counsel of the accused's choosing in confidence;

(c) To be tried without undue delay;

(d) Subject to article 63, paragraph 2, to be present at the trial, to conduct the defence in person or through legal assistance of the accused's choosing, to be informed, if the accused does not have legal assistance, of this right and to have legal assistance assigned by the Court in any case where the interests of justice so require, and without payment if the accused lacks sufficient means to pay for it;

(e) To examine, or have examined, the witnesses against him or her and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his or her behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him or her. The accused shall also be entitled to raise defences and to present other evidence admissible under this Statute;

(f) To have, free of any cost, the assistance of a competent interpreter and such translations as are necessary to meet the requirements of fairness, if any of the proceedings of or documents presented to the Court are not in a language which the accused fully understands and speaks;

(g) Not to be compelled to testify or to confess guilt and to remain silent, without such silence being a consideration in the determination of guilt or innocence;

(h) To make an unsworn oral or written statement in his or her defence; and

(i) Not to have imposed on him or her any reversal of the burden of proof or any onus of rebuttal.

2. In addition to any other disclosure provided for in this Statute, the Prosecutor shall, as soon as practicable, disclose to the defence evidence in the Prosecutor's possession or control which he or she believes shows or tends to show the innocence of the accused, or to mitigate the guilt of the accused, or which may affect the credibility of prosecution evidence. In case of doubt as to the application of this paragraph, the Court shall decide.

Literature:

Kambos, The Right of Non-Self-Incrimination of Witnesses Before the ICC, 15 LEIDEN J. INT'L L. 155 (2002); Baum, Pursuing Justice in a Climate of Moral Outrage: An Evaluation of the Rights of the Accused in the Statute of the International Court, 19 WISCONSIN INT'L L. J. 197 (2001); Stuart Beresford/Hafida Chalal, The Right to be Defended in Person or Through Legal Assistance and the International Criminal Court, LEIDEN J. INT'L L. 949 (2000); Enrique Carnero Rojo, The Role of Fair Trial Considerations in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: From "No Peace Without Justice" to "No Peace with Victor's Justice", 18 LEIDEN J. INT'L L. 829 (2005); Antonio Converti, The Rights of the Accused, in: Flavia Lattanzi (ed.) THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: COMMENTS ON THE DRAFT STATUTE 219 (1998); Louise Doswald-Beck/Robert Kolb, JUDICIAL PROCESS AND HUMAN RIGHTS: UNITED NATIONS, EUROPEAN, AMERICAN AND AFRICAN SYSTEMS (2004); Hakan Friman, Rights of Persons Suspected or Accused of a Crime, in: Roy S. Lee (ed.) THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: THE MAKING OF THE ROME STATUTE: ISSUES, NEGOTIATIONS, AND RESULTS 247 (1999); Richard May/Marieke Wierda, INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL EVIDENCE 259-298 (2002); Sara Sundby, Ensuring a Fair Trial in the International Criminal Court: Statutory Interpretation and the Possibility of Derogation, 31 N. Y. U. J. INT'L L. & POLICY 525 (1999); Vladimir Tochilovsky, CASES, MATERIALS AND LEGAL ASSISTANCE IN INTERNATIONAL PROSECUTIONS (2005); Stefan Trechsel, HUMAN RIGHTS

Contents:

	Paragraph No.
A. Introduction/General Remarks	1
B. Analysis and interpretation of elements
I. Paragraph 1
1. Chapeau	7
a) "any charge"	8
b) "public hearing"	9
c) "Having regard to the provisions of this Statute"	14
d) "fair hearing"	15
e) "conducted impartially"	16
f) "in full equality"	18
2. Minimum guarantees
(a) Information about the charges	19
(b) Time to prepare defence	22
(c) Trial without undue delay	26
(d) Rights of the defence	28
(1) Presence at trial
(2) Defend oneself or
(3) Choice of counsel
(4) Free legal assistance
(e) Rights of the defence
(1) Examination of witne
(2) Defences
(f) Interpreter
(g) Right to silence
(h) Unsworn statement
(i) Restrictive interp
II. Paragraph 2
C. Special Remarks
1. Omitted provision
2. Role of article 67 in the applicable law

A. Introduction/General Remarks

1 During the Second World War, Churchill and other Allied leaders flirted with some form of summary justice for major war criminals[1]. The concept now is Indeed, only a few years later, one of the Nuremberg Tribunals held that prosecutors involved in a trial lacking the fundamental guarantees of fairness could be held respo crimes against humanity. Such guarantees include the right of the accused to introduc to confront witnesses, to present evidence, to be tried in public, to have counsel of cho be informed of the nature of the charges[2]. Certainly, the credibility of internation depends on rigorous respect for the rights of the accused to a fair trial, an id frequently expressed during the development of the ICC Statute. Nor can the exemplary international courts be gainsaid; their treatment of the accused provides a model justice systems throughout the world in the respect of fundamental human rights.

2 The Statute might well have omitted a general provision dealing with the rights accused. Many specific guarantees are incorporated in other articles of the Statute an be little doubt that even in the absence of a more general text, the judges would fo internationally recognized norms. Principle 5 of the United Nations Basic Principles Independence of the Judiciary provides: "The principle of the independence of the entitles and requires the judiciary to ensure that judicial proceedings are conducted that the rights of the parties are respected"[3]. The Statute imposes a duty upon the Trial to see that "a trial is fair and expeditious and is conducted with full respect for the rights accused"[4]. Furthermore, there is the constant danger that any codification, left in the conservative judges, may tend to constrict the development of the law rather than The original contribution of article 67 may well be that rather than merely restate have already been codified, it elaborates on the relatively laconic provisions of

---

1 A.J. Kochavi, PRELUDE TO NUREMBERG: ALLIED WAR CRIMES POLICY AND THE QUESTION (63-91 (1998).

2 United States of America v. Hostages trial ("Justice trial"), (1948) 3 TWC 1, 6 L.R. (T.W.C. 1 p. 97 (L.R.T.W.C.)

3 U.N. Doc. A/CONF.121/22/Rev.1, U.N. Res. 40/146 (1985). The Basic Principles are cited in th of the International Criminal Court's Code of Judicial Ethics, Document ICC-ASP/3/2003/3/Ad

4 Rome Statute, article 64 para. 1.

3145 and, moreover, develops new rights which do not yet appear in human rights treaties and declarations.

The right to a fair trial is recognized in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights[5], and in 3 the universal and regional human rights conventions that it inspired[6], as well as in humanitarian law instruments[7]. The model for article 67 of the Statute is article 14 of the ICCPR[8], although with some major distinctions. Article 14 of the ICCPR applies to civil and administrative proceedings, as well as criminal trials. Article 14 contains provisions dealing with trial of juvenile offenders[9] which are irrelevant to the work of the ICC because of the Rome Conference's decision to exclude jurisdiction in the case of suspects who were under eighteen years of age at the time of the offence[10]. The ICCPR fair trial provision also recognizes some specific rights that are enshrined elsewhere in the Statute, notably the presumption of innocence[11], a right of appeal[12], to compensation in cases of erroneous conviction[13], and to protection against double jeopardy[14].

The ILC Draft Statute of 1994 contained a provision entitled "Rights of the Accused" that 4 was essentially a copy of article 14 para. 3 of the ICCPR[15]. The only significant departure was the inclusion of a second paragraph requiring the prosecutor to disclose exculpatory evidence to the defence. In addition, the ILC made the text gender neutral, replacing masculine pronouns with reference to "the accused". In 1995, the Ad Hoc Committee of the General Assembly examined the ILC Draft Statute, observing that "in view of the considerable powers [the Court] would enjoy in relation to individuals, [it] should be bound to apply the highest standards of justice, integrity and due process"[16]. Its discussion focussed on the issue of mandatory legal assistance, and on the need to establish rules on the qualifications, powers and remuneration of defence attorneys, and on the procedure for their appointment by the Court[17].

G.A. Res. 217A(III), U.N. Doc. A/810 (1948). "Article 10. Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him. Article 11 para. 3. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence".

ICCPR, 999 U.N.T.S. 171, entered into force 23 Mar. 1976, article 14; American Convention on Human Rights, 1144 U.N.T.S. 123, entered into force 18 July 1978, article 8; European Convention on Human Rights, 213 U.N.T.S. 221, entered into force 3 Sep. 1953, article 6; African Charter on Human and People's Rights, O.A.U. Doc. CAB/LEG/67/3 rev. 5, entered into force 21 Oct. 1986, article 7; Convention on the Rights of the Child, G.A. Res. 44/25, Annex, entered into force 2 Sep. 1990, article 40 § 2.

Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, 75 U.N.T.S. 135, entered into force 21 Oct. 1950, articles 84-87, 99-108; Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilians, entered into force 21 Oct. 1950, article 5, 64-76; Add. Prot. I to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and Relating to The Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts, 1125 U.N.T.S. 3, entered into force 7 Dec. 1978, article 75; Add. Prot. II to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and Relating to The Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts, 1125 U.N.T.S. 3, entered into force 7 Dec. 1978, article 6.

It was also the model for the provisions dealing with the rights of the accused in the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia [ICTY], U.N. Doc. S/RES/827, Annex, article 21, and the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda [ICTR], U.N. Doc. S/RES/955, Annex, article 20. The Secretary-General's Report, U.N. Doc. S/25704, para. 106, stated: "It is axiomatic that the International Tribunal must fully respect internationally recognized standards regarding the rights of the accused at all stages of its proceedings. In the view of the Secretary-General, such internationally recognized standards are, in particular, contained in article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights".

Supra note 6, ICCPR, article 14 paras. 1, 4.

Supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 26.

Supra note 6, ICCPR, article 14 para. 2. See: supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 66.

Supra note 6, ICCPR, article 14 para. 5. See: supra note 4, Rome Statute, articles 81-84.

Supra note 6, ICCPR article 14 para. 6. See: supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 85.

Supra note 6, ICCPR, article 14 para. 7. See: supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 20.

1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 41, pp. 114-115.

Ad Hoc Committee Report, para. 129, p. 29.

Ibid., para. 175, p. 35.

5793

5 Rights of an accused were considered by the informal working group at the August session of the Preparatory Committee, and a number of detailed comments and suggestions specific points appear in the report of these discussions[18]. The subject was again addressed the Preparatory Committee in August 1997. By this point, the innovative spirit of the Preparatory Committee was becoming apparent, and there were many departures from the text of article 14 para. 3 of the ICCPR, several of them without square brackets, indicating that it had been agreed to by consensus[19]. There were also many cross-references to other provisions of the Statute, showing the Committee's concern that the rights of the accused not only be recognized generally, but that they be reflected in specific procedural provisions. In addition to "improved" versions of the rights set out in article 14 of the ICCPR, the Committee's 1997 draft also contained several new rights: to make an unsworn statement, to have the Court seek co-operation in gathering evidence, to be protected against any reverse onus or duty of rebuttal, to be free from unjust search and seizure, and a general entitlement to due process. The August 1997 Preparatory Committee's text was reproduced in the Zutphen compilation and the Final Draft of the Preparatory Committee with little modification[20].

6 The Rome Conference quickly agreed on most of the provisions in article 67. It was made quite clear to the delegates that the minimum guarantees enshrined in article 14 of the ICCPR were being enlarged, and they were invited to accept or reject such an approach. The Conference adopted the latter route without hesitation. Negotiating difficulties with the provisions concerning appearance at trial, funded counsel and disclosure of evidence by the prosecution took slightly more time to be resolved. The proposals concerning search and seizure and due process were dropped as being redundant.

B. Analysis and interpretation of elements

I. Paragraph 1

1. Chapeau

7 The chapeau provision of article 67 is an amalgam of norms contained in paras. 1 and 2 of article 14 of the ICCPR. In effect, it takes the chapeau of article 14 para. 3 of the ICCPR, with minor modifications, and adds the notions of a public, fair and impartial hearing that appear in article 14 para. 1. The text differs significantly from the original ILC Draft[21] and reflects a proposal made at the Rome Conference, on 2 July, by the Chair of the Working Group[22].

---

18 1996 Preparatory Committee I, paras. 270-279, pp. 57-59.

19 Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, pp. 34-36.

20 Zutphen Draft, pp. 114-115; Draft Statute for the ICC, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/2/Rev.1, pp. 126-128.

21 Supra note 15, 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 41: "In the determination of any charge under this Statute, the accused is entitled to a fair and public hearing, subject to article 43, and to the following minimum guarantees: ...".

22 Draft proposal for article 67 submitted by the chairman, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.42 (2 July): "In the determination of any charge, the accused is entitled to a public hearing, having regard to the provisions of this Statute, to a fair hearing conducted impartially, and to the following minimum guarantees in full equality"." It was adopted by the Committee with the addition of the word "and" before the words "to a fair hearing": Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.2 (4 July), pp. 4-5. The Drafting Committee removed the word "and", and made other minor changes. Compendium of draft articles referred to the Drafting Committee by the Committee of the Whole as of 9 July 1998, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.58, pp. 41-42: "In the determination of any charge, the accused shall be entitled to a public hearing, having regard to the provisions of this Statute, to a fair hearing conducted impartially, and to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality".

3147

a) "any charge"

The reference to "any charge" must apply to trials on accusations based on the four core crimes enumerated in article 5 of the Statute. The Court is also competent to judge "[o]ffences against the administration of justice", pursuant to article 70, and the rights of an accused would also apply in such proceedings. Some adaptation would appear to be required in proceedings for removal of a Registrar or Deputy Registrar, pursuant to article 46 para. 3 of the Statute, as these are not criminal in nature. Where the rights set out in article 67 do not apply necessarily is in other proceedings before the Court, for example those relating to a hearing subsequent to a decision by the Prosecutor not to proceed with charges[23] or to conduct an investigation[24]. Indeed, rights during an investigation are set out in a distinct provision of the Statute[25]. Nevertheless, the phrase "in the determination of any charge" is essentially identical to the wording of the international models, such as article 6 para. 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights[26]. The European Court of Human Rights considers this to be "the official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he has committed a criminal offence" or an act that has "the implication of such an allegation and which likewise substantially affects the situation of the suspect"[27]. An individual might become "substantially affected", to borrow the Strasbourg terminology, once a State party has asked that a case be examined[28], or upon the application by the Prosecutor to initiate an investigation[29]. If notions of complementarity are factored in, the right may even be extended to encompass proceedings under domestic law prior to exercise of jurisdiction of the Court. 8

b) "public hearing"

The principle of a public hearing, stated in the chapeau of article 67 para. 1, is developed in the Regulations of the Court. Regulation 20 states: 9

> "1. All hearings shall be held in public, unless otherwise provided in the Statute, Rules, these Regulations or ordered by the Chamber.
> 2. When a Chamber orders that certain hearings be held in closed session, the Chamber shall make public the reasons for such an order.
> 3. A Chamber may order the disclosure of all or part of the record of closed proceedings when the reasons for ordering its non-disclosure no longer exist".

The Regulations provide for broadcasting and recording of hearings. Subregulation 21 para. 1 says that "publicity of hearings may extend beyond the courtroom and may be through broadcasting by the Registry or release of transcripts or recordings, unless otherwise ordered by the Chamber". According to subregulation 21 para. 2, "[i[n order to protect sensitive information, broadcasts of audio- and videorecordings of all hearings shall, unless otherwise ordered by the Chamber, be delayed by at least 30 minutes"[30].

The text of article 67 of the Statute differs from that of article 14 of the ICCPR in that it does not enumerate the exceptions to the right to a public hearing. Article 14 para. 1 of the ICCPR allows the exclusion of the press and the public "for reasons of morals, public order (ordre public) or national security in a democratic society, or when the interest of the private lives of the parties so requires, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice". Moreover, according to the ICCPR, the judgment must always be made public "except where the interest of juvenile

---

[23] Supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 53 para. 3.
[24] Ibid., articles 56-58.
[25] Ibid., article 55.
[26] Supra note 6.
[27] Corigliano v. Italy, Ser. A, No. 57, 10 Dec. 1982, para. 34.
[28] Supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 14 para. 1.
[29] Ibid., article 15 para. 3.
[30] See also Regulations of the Registry, Document ICC-BD/03-01-06, regulation 42.

5775

persons otherwise requires"[31]. A detailed enumeration of exceptions to the public hearing principle had been proposed but was rejected by the Preparatory Committee. These derogations included: the deliberations of the Court; protection of public order or of human dignity; safety and protection of the accused, of the victims or of witnesses. Victims of sexual violence were to be entitled as of right to an in camera hearing[32].

10 To the extent there is a residual power to derogate from the norm of a public hearing as found in article 64 para. 7: "The trial shall be held in public. The Trial Chamber may, however, determine that special circumstances require that certain proceedings be in closed session for the purposes set forth in article 68, or to protect confidential or sensitive information to be given in evidence". That the public hearing requirement of the chapeau of article 67 is subordinate to article 64 para. 7 is implied by the words "having regard to the provisions of this Statute" in the chapeau. In any case, the exceptions listed in article 64 para. 7 are presented in a more elaborate fashion in articles 68, 69 and 72. According to the Regulations of the Court, "[a]t the request of a participant or the Registry, or proprio motu ... the Chamber may, in the interests of justice, order that any information likely to present a risk to the security or safety of victims, witnesses or other persons, or likely to be prejudicial to national security interests, shall not be published in any broadcast, audio- or video-recording or transcript of a public hearing"[33].

11 Article 68 concerns the protection of victims and witnesses. Specifically, article 68 para. 2 provides: "As an exception to the principle of public hearings provided for in article 67, the Chambers of the Court may, to protect victims and witnesses or an accused, conduct any part of the proceedings in camera or allow the presentation of evidence by electronic or other special means. In particular, such measures shall be implemented in the case of a victim of sexual violence or a child who is a victim or a witness, unless otherwise ordered by the Court, having regard to all the circumstances, particularly the views of the victim or witness". The already elaborate case law of the ad hoc Tribunals in this matter should guide the Court in this difficult area[34]. A mere glance at the jurisprudence of the Court indicates just how dramatic an impact issues concerning victim and witness protection can have on the general principle of public hearing and access to the record. Many hearings are held totally or partially in camera, and decisions are often published in severely redacted versions.

12 The second exception allowed by article 64 para. 7 is the protection of confidential or sensitive information[35]. Confidential or sensitive information may have several sources. There may be claims to confidentiality based on privilege, and the Court is to respect this pursuant to article 69 para. 5, as provided for in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. But the major source of problems with this exception will be information derived from sovereign States. The Statute allows a State to apply "for necessary measures" to respect "confidential or sensitive information"[36]. Other exceptions to the rule dictating a public hearing are the possibility of in camera and even ex parte hearings with respect to the protection of national security information[37] and the power of the court to exclude disruptive individuals, including the accused[38].

---

31 Note that article 76 para. 4 of the Statute requires that the judgment be rendered in public.

32 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 195-196.

33 Regulations of the Court, Document ICC-BD/01-01-04, subregulation 21 para. 8.

34 For example: Prosecutor v. Tadić, Case No. IT-94-1-T, Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion requesting protective measures for victims and witnesses, 10 Aug. 1995; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, Case No. ICTR-96-3-T, Decision on the Preliminary Motion submitted by the Prosecutor for Protective Measures for Witnesses, 26 Sep. 1996. See: A.-M. La Rosa, Réflexions sur l'apport du Tribunal pénal international pour l'ex-Yougoslavie au droit à un procès équitable, REV. GÉN. DROIT INT'L PUBLIC 945, 962-970 (1997).

35 Also: supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 64 para. 6 (c).

36 Ibid., article 68 para. 6.

37 Ibid., article 72 para. 7.

38 Ibid., articles 63 para. 2, 71 para. 1.

3149

Article 61 para. 1 specifies the right of the accused to be present at the hearing on the confirmation of charges. But this would clearly seem to be a hearing "[i]n the determination of the charge" of "an accused", and therefore the public hearing rule ought to apply. In other words, not only the accused but also the public should have access to such proceedings. The first confirmation hearing, that of Thomas Lubanga, was accordingly held in public with considerable publicity. Pre-Trial Chamber even made an order authorizing photography by representatives of the media[39]. 13

c) "having regard to the provisions of this Statute"

The words "having regard to the provisions of this Statute" suggest that article 67 can be limited by express provisions to the contrary. An example would be article 64 para. 7, which limits the right to a public hearing. The wording in the chapeau of article 67 is decidedly unenthusiastic. The Preparatory Committee Draft did not include any such general provision, preferring to enumerate any exceptions to the judicial guarantees recognized to the accused in a specific fashion[40]. A proposal from the United Kingdom submitted at Rome eschewed any equivocation on this point, beginning the text of article 67 with the words "[s]ubject to the provisions of this Statute ..."[41]. There is a suggestion in the travaux préparatoires that the words "subject to ..." put article 67 in a subordinate position, whereas the words "having regard to ..." do not[42]. 14

d) "fair hearing"

The general right to a "fair hearing" provides defendants with a powerful tool to go beyond the text of the Statute, and to require that the Court's respect for the rights of an accused keep pace with the progressive development of human rights law. The notion of a fair hearing goes back, in international human rights law, to article 10 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Of course, it is repeated in article 14 of the ICCPR and in the regional instruments. The case law of the Strasbourg organs, established to implement the European Convention on Human Rights, has used this residual right to a fair hearing to fill in some of the gaps in the more specific provisions[43]. That the term "fair hearing" invites the Court to go beyond the precise terms of article 67 in appropriate circumstances is confirmed by the reference within the chapeau to "minimum guarantees"[44]. The term "fair hearing" also suggests that where individual problems with specific rights set out in article 67 do not, on their own, amount to a violation, the requirement of a fair hearing may allow a cumulative view and lead to the conclusion that there is a breach where there have been a number of apparently minor or less significant encroachments on article 67[45]. 15

The international case law has developed the notion of "equality of arms" within the concept of the right to a fair trial[46]. The ICTY Appeals Chamber has described the principle of equality

---

39 Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/0, Ordonnance autorisant la prise de photographies à l'audience du 9 novembre 2006, 6 Nov. 2006.

40 Supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 114, article 60; supra note 20, Draft Statute, article 67, pp. 106-108.

41 Proposal submitted by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.33 (29 June), p. 1.

42 Supra note 18, 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 59, para. 279.

43 D.J. Harris/M. O'Boyle/C. Warbrick, LAW OF THE EUROPEAN CONVENTION ON HUMAN RIGHTS 202-203 (1995).

44 Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06, Décision relative au système définitif de divulgation et à l'établissment d'un échéancier, Annexe I, Analyse de la décisions relative au système définitif de divulgation, 15 May 2006, para. 97.

45 Stanford v. United Kingdom, Ser. A, No. 182-A, 30 Aug. 1990, para. 24.

46 Neumeister v. Austria, Ser. A, No. 8, 11 Y.B. 822, 27 June 1968; M. Novak, CCPR COMMENTARY 247 (1993). For recognition of the principle of "equality of arms" by the ICTY, see: Prosecutor v. Tadić, Case of arms 'as being only one feature of the wider concept of a fair trial'[47]. In Tadić, the ICTY Appeals Chamber explained that 'the principle of equality of arms falls within the fair trial guarantee under the Statute'. It continued:

> [U]nder the Statute of the International Tribunal the principle of equality of arms must be given a more liberal interpretation than that normally upheld with regard to proceedings before domestic courts. This principle means that the Prosecution and the Defence must be equal before the Trial Chamber. It follows that the Chamber shall provide every practicable facility it is capable of granting under the Rules and Statute when faced with a request by a party for assistance in presenting its case. The Trial Chambers are mindful of the difficulties encountered by the parties in tracing and gaining access to evidence in the territory of the former Yugoslavia where some States have not been forthcoming in complying with their legal obligation to cooperate with the Tribunal. Provisions under the Statute and the Rules exist to alleviate the difficulties faced by the parties so that each side may have equal access to witnesses[48].

But 'equality of arms [...] does not necessarily amount to the material equality of possessing the same financial and/or personal resources'[49].

The concept of "equality of arms" has been invoked in early decisions of the International Criminal Court. For example, according to Pre-Trial Chamber II, "[f]airness is closely linked to the concept of 'equality of arms', or of balance between the parties during the proceedings. As commonly understood, it concerns the ability of a party to a proceeding to adequately make its case, with a view to influencing the outcome of the proceedings in its favour"[50].

e) "conducted impartially"

16 The Statute states that the hearing must be "conducted impartially", whereas article 14 of the ICCPR requires that it be conducted "by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal". The Zutphen Draft referred to "an independent and impartial tribunal"[51]. Curiously, the statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals impose no requirements in this respect[52], perhaps because the Security Council considered the matter to be beyond debate, although this did not prevent defendants from raising the issue[53]. At the International Criminal Court, not only judges, but also the judges, the Prosecutor, the Deputy Prosecutors, the Registrar and the Deputy Registrar are required to make a solemn undertaking in open court to exercise their functions "impartially"[54].

17 Of course, the issue of impartiality of the judiciary is also addressed elsewhere in the Statute[55]. Impartiality is also protected by specific provisions in the Court's Code of Judicial Ethics.

No. IT-94-1-T, Separate Opinion of Judge Vohrah on Prosecution Motion for Production of Defence Witness Statements, 27 Nov. 1996, pp. 4, 7.

47 Prosecutor v. Kordić et al., Case No. IT-95-14/2-A, Decision on the Application by Mario Cerkez for Extension of Time to File his Respondent's Brief, 11 Sep. 2001, para. 5.

48 Prosecutor v. Tadić, Case No. IT-94-1-A, Judgment, 15 July 1999, para. 52. The United States of America invoked the Appeals Chamber's comments before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, in a case dealing with capital punishment, as authority for the proposition that 'equality of arms' concerns procedural but not substantive equality: Garza v. United States of America, Report No. 52/01, Case 12.243, 4 Apr. 2001, para. 56.

49 Prosecutor v. Kayishema et al., Case No. ICTR-95-1-A, Judgment (Reasons), 1 June 2001, paras. 63-71; Prosecutor v. Milutinovic et al., Case No. IT-99-37-AR73. 2, Decision on Interlocutory Appeal on Motion for Additional Funds, 13 Nov. 2003.

50 Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05, Decision on Prosecutor's Application for leave to Appeal in Part Pre-Trial Chamber II's Decision on the Prosecutor's Applications for Warrants of Arrest under Article 58, 19 Aug. 2005, para. 30. Also: Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06, Décision sur la demande d'autorisation d'appel de la Défense relative à la transmission des Demandes de participation des victimes, 6 Nov. 2006, p. 7.

51 Supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 114, article 60.

52 Supra note 8, Statute of the ICTY, article 21; supra note 8, Statute of the ICTR, article 20.

53 Prosecutor v. Tadić, Case No. IT-94-1-AR72, Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, 2 Oct. 1995.

54 Supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 45; Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Document ICC-ASP/1/3, pp. 10–107, Rule 5.

55 Supra note 4, Rome Statute, articles 35, 40, 41.

3151

"Article 4

Impartiality

1. Judges shall be impartial and ensure the appearance of impartiality in the discharge of their judicial functions.

2. Judges shall avoid any conflict of interest, or being placed in a situation which might reasonably be perceived as giving rise to a conflict of interest"[56].

According to the European Court of Human Rights, "impartiality" means lack of "prejudice or bias"[57]. It comprises both a subjective and an objective dimension: "[t]he existence of impartiality ... must be determined according to a subjective test, that is, on the basis of the personal conviction of a particular judge in a given case, and also according to an objective test, namely, ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in this respect"[58].

The ICTY Appeals Chamber has described judicial impartiality as follows:

> [A] Judge should not only be subjectively free from bias, but also [...] there should be nothing in the surrounding circumstances that objectively gives rise to an appearance of bias. On this basis, the Appeals Chamber considers that the following principles should direct it in interpreting and applying the impartiality requirement of the Statute:
>
> A. A Judge is not impartial if it is shown that actual bias exists.
>
> B. There is an unacceptable appearance of bias if:
>
> (i) a Judge is a party to the case, or has a financial or proprietary interest in the outcome of a case, or if the Judge's decision will lead to the promotion of a cause in which he or she is involved, together with one of the parties. Under these circumstances, a Judge's disqualification from the case is automatic; or
>
> (ii) the circumstances would lead a reasonable observer, properly informed, to reasonably apprehend bias[59].

The Rome Statute provides the most advanced and thorough regime in order to ensure both independence and impartiality of its judiciary. It constitutes a dramatic improvement on the norms applicable to the ad hoc tribunals. In this respect, the limitation of judges to one term of office, and a clarification of both the grounds for dismissal and the body responsible for doing so constitute major improvements upon earlier models.

f) "in full equality"

The terms "in full equality" are imported from article 14 para. 3 of the ICCPR. They complement the initial phrase of article 14, "[a]ll persons shall be equal before the courts and tribunals" for which there is no equivalent in article 67 of the Statute. Nevertheless, article 21 para. 1 of the Statute comprises a non-discrimination clause applicable to the instrument as a whole. The guarantee of full equality before the ICC protects the accused against discriminatory practices and even vexatious prosecution where it appears to be motivated by discriminatory criteria. 18

In the Čelebići case, the ICTY Appeals Chamber considered the principle of equality before the law within the context of prosecutorial discretion. It said:

> "This provision reflects the corresponding guarantee of equality before the law found in many international instruments, including the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the 1966 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions, and the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. All these instruments provide for a right to equality before the law, which is central to the principle of the due process of law. The provisions reflect a firmly established principle of international law of equality before the law, which encompasses the requirement that there should be no discrimination in the enforcement or application of the law. Thus Article 21 and the principle it embodies prohibits discrimination in the application of the law based on impermissible motives such as, inter alia, race, colour, religion, opinion, national or ethnic 56 Code of Judicial Ethics, supra note 3.

---

57 Piersack v. Belgium, Ser. A, No. 53, 1 Oct. 1982.

Hauschildt v. Denmark, Ser. A, No. 154, 24 Dec. 1989, para. 46.

58 Prosecutor v. Furundžija (Case No. IT-95-17/1-A), Judgment, 21 July 2000, para. 189.

3152

origin. The Prosecutor, in exercising her discretion under the Statute in the investigation and indictment of accused before the Tribunal, is subject to the principle of equality before the law and to the requirement of non-discrimination"[60].

The Appeals Chamber suggested that there would be a violation of equality before the law 'the decision to prosecute him or to continue his prosecution was based on impermissible motives, such as race or religion, and that the Prosecution failed to prosecute similarly situated defendants'[61]. To show the Prosecutor is proceeding on a selective basis, 'the evidence of discriminatory intent must be coupled with the evidence that the Prosecutor's policy has a discriminatory effect, so that other similarly situated individuals of other ethnic or religious backgrounds were not prosecuted'[62].

An ICTY Trial Chamber has suggested that the right to equality before the law might be violated in cases of plea-bargaining. For example, it mentioned the possibility that the Prosecutor might seek to make a plea agreement with some accused because of their knowledge of particular events which may be useful in prosecutions of other, more high ranking accused. The Prosecutor could make the terms of such a plea agreement quite generous in order to secure the co-operation of that accused. "Other accused, who may not have been involved in the most egregious crimes or who may not have been part of a joint criminal enterprise with more high ranking accused, may not be offered such a generous plea agreement, or indeed any plea agreement", said the decision[63].

2. Minimum guarantees

(a) Information about the charge

19 Article 67 para. 1 (a) of the Statute complements similar provisions protecting suspects during an investigation[64] and at the time charges are confirmed[65]. The purpose of the norm is to provide an accused person with the information necessary for the preparation of a defence. The appropriate information required will depend on any questioning the accused has already undergone and on other circumstances of the case[66]. But the accused may be expected to show some diligence in seeking information about the charge, for example by insisting upon attendance at the confirmation hearing[67].

20 Article 14 of the ICCPR refers only to the "nature and cause" of the charge. The Statute goes further than the ICCPR and the other human rights models by requiring that this information also include the "content" of the charge[68]. According to the European Commission on Human Rights, the "nature" of the charge refers to the specific offence, while the "cause" of the charge

---

60 Prosecutor v. Dokalic et al., Case No. IT-96-21-A, Judgment, 20 Feb. 2001, para. 605 (reference omitted)

61 Ibid., para. 607. Also: Prosecutor v. Ntakirutimana et al., Case No. ICTR-96-10 & ICTR-96-17-T, Judgment, 21 Feb. 2003, paras. 870-871.

62 Prosecutor v. Akayesu, Case No. ICTR-96-4-A, Judgment, 1 June 2001, paras. 94-96.

63 Prosecutor v. Momir Nikolić, Case No. IT-02-60/1-S, Sentencing Judgment, 2 Dec. 2003, para. 66.

64 Supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 55 para. 2 (a)

65 Ibid., article 61 para. 3. Also: supra note 33, Regulations of the Court, Regulation 52, which indicates the information that must be included in the document containing the charges: "The document containing the charges referred to in article 61 shall include: (a) The full name of the person and any other relevant identifying information; Regulations of the Court; (b) A statement of the facts, including the time and place of the alleged crimes, which provides a sufficient legal and factual basis to bring the person or persons to trial, including relevant facts for the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court; (c) A legal characterisation of the facts to accord both with the crimes under articles 6, 7 or 8 and the precise form of participation under articles 25 and 28".

66 Kamasinski v. Austria, Ser. A, No. 168, 19 Dec. 1989, paras. 79-81.

67 Campbell and Fell v. United Kingdom, Ser. A, No. 80, 28 June 1984. See: supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 61 para. 2 (a).

68 At the August 1996 session of the Preparatory Committee it was said that the ICCPR provision "needed further elaboration in the Statute": supra note 18, 1996 Preparatory Committee I, para. 271, p. 58.

3153

means the relevant material facts[69]. There may be no meaningful distinction between "cause" and "content", except perhaps a message of exhaustivity[70]. In practice, the European case law has not been very demanding, with the Commission holding that the accused is entitled to material to enable preparation of a defence, "without however necessarily mentioning the evidence on which the charge is based"[71]. However, in the ICC Statute this provision must be taken in combination with the very thorough disclosure requirements that are imposed upon the Prosecutor[72]. Taken as a whole, these provisions indicate the desire of the Rome Conference that the Prosecutor ensure that the accused is not taken by surprise during the proceedings, and that he or she benefits from a level of information going well beyond the thresholds set by domestic justice systems and endorsed by international human rights tribunals as being acceptable.

The requirement that the information be "in a language which the accused fully understands and speaks" develops article 14 para. 3 (a) of the ICCPR, which requires only that it be "in a language which [the accused] understands". A proposal to refer to "his own language" had been left in square brackets by the Preparatory Committee[73], and was added at Rome. An amendment at the Rome Conference contained the phrase "in his or her own language or in a language of his or her choice"[74]. This prompted the Chair to propose: "in a language the accused understands or in his or her language"[75]. The matter sparked considerable controversy. The provision that was finally adopted included a footnote: "It is understood that this expression means the language for which the accused, in good faith, has clearly expressed his or her preference"[76]. To some degree, these are questionable improvements. The purpose served by requiring not only that the accused understand the language but also speak it seems unclear. Note that the ICCPR, in its general provision dealing with the right to an interpreter, presents this in the alternative: "if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court". It was surely not the intention of the drafters of the Statute to provided disabled persons who are unable to speak with a pretext to avoid the jurisdiction of the Court. On the other hand, insisting on this detail helps to exclude some Strasbourg case law by which the norm is respected if the language is understood by the accused's lawyer, and not necessarily by the accused personally[77]. It goes without saying that the information must be provided at no cost to the defendant[78]. 21

(b) Time to prepare defence

This provision is modeled on article 14 para. 3 (b) of the ICCPR with the addition of the words "freely" and "in confidence". It was introduced by the Preparatory Committee at its 22

---

69 Officer v. Austria (No. 524/59), (1960) 3 Y.B. 322, 344. See also: Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., Case No. IT-96-21-T, Decision on defence application for forwarding the documents in the language of the accused (Delalić), 25 Sep. 1996, for determination on the types of materials to be made available to the accused in his or her language.

70 See: Amnesty International, MAKING THE RIGHT CHOICES, PART V (1997).

71 X v. Belgium (No. 7628/76), (1977) 9 D.R. 169.

72 Supra note 4, Rome Statute, articles 61 para. 3 (b), 64 para. 3 (c), 67 para. 2. Also: Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., supra note 77.

73 Supra note 19, Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 34; supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 114, article 60; supra note 20, Draft Statute, article 67, pp. 106-108.

74 Proposal submitted by the Delegations of Egypt, Oman and the Syrian Arab Republic, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.36 (29 June), p. 1.

75 Supra note 22, Draft proposal for article 67.

76 Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.2/ Add.6 (11 July), pp. 3-4, fn. 5.

77 X. v. Austria (No. 6185/73), (1975) 2 D.R. 68.

78 Luedicke, Belkacem and Koc v. Germany, Ser. A, No. 29, 28 Nov. 1978. That these services were free of charge was spelled out in one of the proposals submitted to the Preparatory Committee: 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 196.

3154

August 1997 session[79], and the text remained unchanged through to the final version adopted i Rome[80].

23 Adequate time will depend on the circumstances of the case. Here the international case law is not particularly helpful, because it is a given that the types of cases to come before the IC will be extraordinarily complex and therefore difficult to compare with the more mundan matters of domestic tribunals. The only relevant normative provision, again not particularly helpful, is article 105 of the third Geneva Convention which specifies that counsel have "a period of two weeks at least before the opening of trial"[81]. According to the ICTY, adequate time is a flexible concept that "begs of a definition outside the particular situation of each case It is impossible to set a standard of what constitutes adequate time to prepare a defence because this is something which can be affected by a number of factors including the complexity of the case, and the competing forces and claims at play, such as consideration of the interests of other accused persons"[82].

24 The word "facilities" refers to "documents, records, etc. necessary for preparation of the defence"[83], a right that is complemented by the Statute's extensive disclosure obligations According to the European Commission of Human Rights, this means the accused must have "the opportunity to organize his defence in an appropriate way and without restriction as to the possibility to put all relevant defence arguments before the trial court"[84].

25 With respect to communication with counsel, the addition of the words "freely" and "in confidence" underscore the privileged nature of the communication and the fact that it must be undertaken in secure premises not subject to eavesdropping by the authorities. However, there is nothing explicit in the Statute recognizing the privileged nature of solicitor-client communication[85]. The Preparatory Committee considered that the question of privileged communication should not be dealt with in the provision on rights of the accused[86]. Access to communication by the accused must be both in person and in writing.

(c) Trial without undue delay

26 The provision is identical to that of its model in the ICCPR. During the Preparatory Committee sessions, "[t]he point was also made that an expeditious trial process would prevent a guilty person from delaying the proceedings and would secure the early release of an innocent person. What was needed in this regard was a proactive court which would properly manage the case so as to achieve an early resolution of the case"[87]. Here, too, there were attempts to "improve" the ICCPR text, with suggestions that "undue" be replaced with "unreasonable" and

---

79 Supra note 19, Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 34.

80 Supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 114; supra note 20, Draft Statute, p. 127; supra note 22Draft proposal for article 67,; supra note 22, Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters (4 July), pp. 4-5; supra note 22, Compendium of draft articles, pp. 41-42.

81 Geneva Convention of 12 Aug. 1949 relative to the treatment of prisoners of war, 75 U.N.T.S. 135, entered into force 21 Oct. 1950.

82 Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., Case No. IT-96-21-T, Decision on the applications for adjournment of the trial date, 3 Feb. 1997.

83 Supra note 46, M. Novak, p. 256.

84 Can v. Austria, Ser. A, No. 96, 30 Sep. 1985, Commission Report, para. 53.

85 See: article 69 para. 5, which indicates that this is a question for the Rules. In the travaux, see: 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 196-197; supra note 20, Zutphen, p. 114, fn. 203; supra note 20, Draft Statute, p. 127, fn. 11. The Rules of the ad hoc Tribunals expressly recognize lawyer-client privilege: Rules of Procedure and Evidence, as amended 10 Dec. 1998, U.N. Doc. IT/32, article 97. The United States of America proposed a draft set of rules of evidence for the Court containing a provision ensuring lawyer-client privilege: Reference Paper Submitted by the United States of America, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183, C.1/WGPM/L.21, p. 7, rule 10.

86 Supra note 19, Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 34, fn. 48.

87 Supra note 18, 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 58, para. 271.

3155

that the right "to enjoy a speedy trial" be added[88]. But at Rome, on a proposal from the Chair of the Working Group, the ICCPR text was retained[89].

Case law and academic comment on the ICCPR provision have considered that the time limit begins to run at the moment the suspect or the accused is informed that the authorities are taking steps towards prosecution. The period ends with a definitive decision[90]. What this means specifically will depend on each individual case. In one case, the Human Rights Committee considered the provision had been violated by Canada when the preparation of trial transcripts took twenty-nine months resulting in a three-year delay for an appeal hearing[91]. In Pratt and Morgan v. Jamaica, a delay of forty-five months between dismissal of an appeal and delivery of a written judgment was held to violate the norm[92]. The Nuremberg trial of the major war criminals set an awesome precedent that the ad hoc Tribunals have been unable even to approach. By domestic standards, today's international justice is an incredibly protracted affair. The Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda has considered that inexcusable delay attributable to the Prosecutor, in extreme circumstances, entitles the accused to have the charges dropped 'with prejudice' to the Prosecutor, that is, without the possibility of retrial[93]. 27

In its Court Capacity Model, the International Criminal Court sets out optimistic assessments of the length of proceedings, projecting an average trial to last slightly less than three years from arrest until final judgment, apportioning three months for the confirmation of charges, six months for disclosure and preparation for trial, fifteen months for the trial itself and finally nine months for the appeal[94]. If it succeeds, it will be dramatically faster than the ad hoc tribunals. But in its first case, the confirmation of charges was issued ten months, not three, after the suspect had been taken into custody.

(d) Rights of the defence

Article 67 para. 1 (d) of the Statute substantially reflects the content of article 14 para. 3 (d) of the ICCPR, subject to a number of minor drafting changes. The text is little changed from the ILC Draft[95]. It was approved by the Working Group at the August 1997 Preparatory Committee[96] and was adopted at Rome without change[97]. 28

α) Presence at trial

The right to be present at trial is made subject to article 63 para. 2, which permits the trial to proceed in the absence of an accused who is disruptive. Exceptions exist within the Statute and 29

---

88 Supra note 78, 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 197; supra note 19, Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 34; supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 114; supra note 20,Draft Statute, p. 127. Also, at the Rome Conference, supra note 74, Proposal submitted by the Delegations of Egypt, Oman and the Syrian Arab Republic, p. 1.

89 Supra note 22, Draft proposal for article 67; supra note 22, Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters (4 July), pp. 4-5; supra note 22, Compendium of draft articles, pp. 41-42.

90 Supra note 46, M. Novak, p. 257.

91 Pinkney v. Canada (No. 27/1978), U.N. Doc. CCPR/3/Add.1, Vol. II, p. 385, U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/OP /1, p. 95, 2 HUM. RTS. L.J. 344.

92 Pratt and Morgan v. Jamaica, Nos. 210/1986, 225/1987, U.N. Doc. A/44/40, p. 222, 11 HUM. RTS. L.J. 150.

93 Prosecutor v. Barayagwiza, Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, Decisions of 3 November 1999 and 31 March 2000.

94 Report on the Court Capacity Model, Document ICC-ASP/5/10, para. 23.

95 Supra note 15, 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 41.

96 Supra note 19, 1996 Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, pp. 34-35.

97 Supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 114; supra note 20, Draft Statute, p. 117; supra note 22, Draft proposal for article 67; supra note 22, Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters (4 July), pp. 4-5; Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.2/Add.8 (15 July), p. 6; supra note 22, Compendium of draft articles, pp. 41-42.

3156

the Rules of Procedure and Evidence for ex parte hearings under very specific circumstances. Article 72 para. 7 of the Statute allows for a hearing concerning the protection of national security information to take place ex parte, that is, in the absence of one or both of the parties[98]. Ex parte proceedings during the trial phase are also authorised under the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. The Trial Chamber may hear the Prosecutor ex parte in order to determine whether an assurance may be given to a witness who may make testify in such a way as to incriminate himself or herself[99]. A Trial Chamber may also sit ex parte to consider whether or not to authorise special measures to facilitate testimony of a traumatized victim or witness, a child, an elderly person or a victim of sexual violence[100].

Article 76 para. 4 of the Statute seems to imply that the presence of the accused when sentence is imposed is not indispensable, because it says this should take place "wherever possible". The curious phrase was introduced when the Preparatory Committee was considering the possibility of in absentia trials[101], and remained in the final version of the Statute, although the concept of in absentia trials had been abandoned, without any thought being given to the matter[102]. Thus, article 76 para. 4 should not be seen as an attenuation of the principle of presence of the accused at trial.

β) Defend oneself in person

30 The accused is entitled to defend himself or herself in person. The most celebrated example of this situation took place during the prosecution of Slobodan Milošević before the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. In an initial challenge to the accused's insistence on defending himself, the Prosecutor invoked the fragile medical condition of the defendant. Presiding Judge Richard May wrote: "A plain reading of this provision indicates that there is a right to defend oneself in person and the Trial Chamber is unable to accept the Prosecution's proposition that it would allow for the assignment of defence counsel for the Accused against his wishes in the present circumstances"[103]. Judge May noted that the right to defend oneself was especially important in the essentially adversarial-type proceedings of the ICTY. Here he referred to a relevant decision of the United States Supreme Court, which held that "forcing a lawyer upon an unwilling defendant is contrary to his basic right to defend himself if he truly wants to do so"[104]. As Judge May explained:

> "There is a further practical reason for the right to self-representation in common law. While it may be the case that in civil law systems it is appropriate to appoint defence counsel for an accused who wishes to represent himself, in such systems the court is fulfilling a more investigative role in an attempt to establish the truth. In the adversarial systems, it is the responsibility of the parties to put forward the case and not for the court, whose function it is to judge. Therefore, in an adversarial system, the imposition of defence counsel on an unwilling accused would effectively deprive that accused of the possibility of putting forward a defence. In this connection, Article 21 (4) (d) of the Statute may be said to be reflective of the common law position"[105].

But in another case involving an obstreperous defendant, another Trial Chamber of the ICTY signalled the difference in approach between common law and "civil law" systems, noting that 98 Supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 72 para. 7.

99 Supra note 54, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, rule 74 para. 4.
100 Ibid., rule 88(2).
101 Supra note 5, Draft Statute, article 76, fn. 25.
102 Supra note 97, Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters (15 July), p. 10. In this respect, there is an error in Report of the Drafting Committee to the Committee of the Whole, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.88 (16 July), p. 14, which states that the Committee of the Whole adopted the following: "The sentence shall be pronounced in public and in the presence of the accused", without the words "whenever possible".
103 Prosecutor v. Milošević, Case No. IT-02-54-T, Reasons for Decision on the Prosecution Motion Concerning Assignment of Counsel, 4 Apr. 2003, para. 18.
104 Faretta v. California, 422 US 806, 817 (1975).
105 Supra note 103, Prosecutor v. Milošević, para. 24.

3157

international human rights case law acknowledged that the right to defend oneself was subject to limitations. It also observed that "[t]he Accused is in fact increasingly demonstrating a tendency to act in an obstructionist fashion while at the same time revealing a need for legal assistance". Consequently, the Trial Chamber ordered the appointment of "standby counsel", who would be mandated to assist the accused, and "in exceptional circumstances to take over the defence from the Accused at trial should the Trial Chamber find, following a warning, that the Accused is engaging in disruptive conduct or conduct requiring his removal from the courtroom"[106]. Subsequently, the Trial Chamber attempted to impose counsel on Šešelj, who went on a hunger strike in protest. After he had been without food for many days, the Appeals Chamber overruled the Trial Chamber[107].

After Judge May withdrew from the Milošević case because of a serious illness of his own, his two colleagues, together with the new judge appointed in his place, and inspired by the Šešelj ruling of the other Trial Chamber, revised their earlier decision. Noting the ongoing medical problems of the accused, which had occasioned several adjournments in the course of the two and half years of hearings, the Trial Chamber said: "If at any stage of a trial there is a real prospect that it will be disrupted and the integrity of the trial undermined with the risk that it will not be conducted fairly, then the Trial Chamber has a duty to put in place a regime which will avoid that. Should self-representation have that impact, we conclude that it is open to the Trial Chamber to assign counsel to conduct the defence case, if the Accused will not appoint his own counsel"[108]. The Trial Chamber said it "was of the opinion that it was necessary to relieve the Accused of the burden of conducting his own case with a view to stabilising his health to ensure, so far as possible, that the trial proceeds with the minimum of interruption in a way that will permit the orderly presentation of the Accused's case and the completion of the trial within a reasonable time in his interests and the interests of justice: in other words, to secure for the Accused a fair and expeditious trial"[109].

The "assigned counsel" appealed the decision, which was reversed, in part, by the Appeals Chamber. The Appeals Chamber stated that the right of an accused person to defend himself or herself could indeed be curtailed on the grounds that a defendant's self-representation is substantially and persistently obstructing the proper and expeditious conduct of his trial. It reasoned by analogy with the right to be tried in one's own presence, which the Tribunal noted was subject to limitation in the event of disruption. "If a defendant's right to be present for his trial – which, to reiterate, is listed in the same string of rights and indeed in the same clause as the right to self-representation – may thus be restricted on the basis of substantial trial disruption, the Appeals Chamber sees no reason to treat the right to self-representation any differently", it said[110]. In the case of disruption, the accused can be said to have consciously and intentionally waived the right to be present at trial, and to act in his or her own defence. The Appeals Chamber said that "it cannot be that the only kind of disruption legitimately cognizable by a Trial Chamber is the intentional variety. How should the Tribunal treat a defendant whose health, while good enough to engage in the ordinary and non-strenuous activities of everyday life, is not sufficiently robust to withstand all the rigours of trial work – the late nights, the 106 Prosecutor v. Šešelj, Case No. IT-03-67-PT, Decision on Prosecution's Motion for Order Appointing Counsel to Assist Vojislav Šešelj With his Defence, 9 May 2003.

107 Prosecutor v. Šešelj, Case No. IT-03-67-AR73.3, Decision on Appeal Against the Trial Chamber's Decision on Assignment of Counsel, 20 Oct. 2006.

108 Prosecutor v. Milošević, Case No. IT-02-54-T, Reasons for Decision on Assignment of Defence Counsel, 22 Sep. 2004, para. 33. See also: Prosecutor v. Milošević, Case No. IT-02-54-T, Order on Future Conduct of the Trial, 6 July 2004.

109 Ibid., para. 66.

110 Prosecutor v. Milošević, Case No. IT-02-54-AR73.7, Decision on Interlocutory Appeal of the Trial Chamber's Decision on the Assignment of Defence Counsel, 1 Nov. 2004, para. 13.

3158

stressful cross-examinations, the courtroom confrontations – unless the hearing schedule is reduced to one day a week, or even one day a month"[111]?

The Trial Chamber of the Special Court for Sierra Leone has also considered the question of self-representation[112]. Referring to the formulation of the right of self-representation, the SCSL Trial Chamber said that because article 17 Para. 4 (d) of the Court's Statute spoke of 'the right to have legal assistance assigned', this proved that "the right to defend himself or herself in person" was only a qualified and not an absolute right. Unlike Milošević, the SCSL defendant, Hinga Norman, had no apparent medical problems, nor was he misbehaving in court. The judges simply felt he wasn't up to the job of defending itself, adding that the problems this might cause would also impact negatively on the right of the other two defendants in the case to a speedy trial[113]. Finally, the judges laid emphasis on the "time limited mandate of the Court"[114], a reference to the parsimonious resources allocated by the United Nations. The Trial Chamber concluded with an oxymoron, writing that "[t]he right to self-representation in this case ... can only be exercised with the assistance of Counsel"[115].

The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Court do not contemplate this situation, probably because the issues had not yet arisen before the ad hoc tribunals when the Rules were drafted. No clear formula has yet emerged at the ad hoc tribunals, where the approach sometimes seems rather improvised. Even where the fundamental justification for setting aside the right to self-representation is expediency, it is doubtful whether such a result is in fact achieved.

γ) Choice of counsel

31 Although the accused is entitled to choice of counsel, this right cannot be unlimited. The Court may impose ethical, linguistic and other professional requirements in order to establish qualifications for counsel, as under domestic legal systems. The European Commission of Human Rights dismissed claims alleging a violation of the right to counsel on the basis of failure to respect professional ethics[116], where counsel was also a defence witness[117], and even for a refusal to wear a gown[118]. There is no right to choice of counsel when a defendant relies upon legal aid. According to the ICTR Appeals Chamber, "in the light of a textual and systematic interpretation of the provisions of the Statute and the Rules, read in conjunction with relevant decisions from the Human Rights Committee and the organs of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, that the right to free legal assistance by counsel does not confer the right to choose one's counsel"[119]. Nevertheless, the practice of the ad hoc tribunals has been to accommodate representation by counsel chosen by the accused, where feasible, and this approach is reflected in the Regulations of the Court:

---

111 Ibid., para. 14.

112 Prosecutor v. Norman et al., Case No. SCSL-04-14-PT, Ruling on the Issue of Non-Appearance of the First Accused Samual Hinga Norman, the Second Accused Moinina Fofana, and the Third Accused, Allieu Kondewa at the Trial Proceedings, 1 Oct. 2004, para. 23.

113 Prosecutor v. Norman et al., Case No. SCSL-04-14-PT, Decision on the Application of Sam Hinga Norman for Self-Representation Under Article 17(4)(d) of the Statute of the Special Court, 8 June 2004.

114 Ibid., para. 26.

115 Ibid., para. 32.

116 Ensslin, Baader and Raspe v. Federal Republic of Germany, App. Nos. 7572/76, 7586/76 and 7587/76, (1978) 14 D.R. 64.

117 K. v. Denmark (No. 19524/92), unreported.

118 X. and Y v. Federal Republic of Germany, App. Nos. 5217/71 and 5367/72, (1972) 42 COLL. 139.

119 Prosecutor v. Kambanda, ICTR 97-23-A, Judgment, 19 Oct 2000, para. 33; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-A, Judgment, 1 June 2001, paras. 60-61; Prosecutor v. Ntakirutimana et al., ICTR-96-10-T and ICTR-96-17-T, Decision on the Motions of the Accused for Replacement of Assigned Counsel, 11 June 1997.

"Regulation 75

Choice of defence counsel

1. If the person entitled to legal assistance chooses a counsel included in the list of counsel, the Registrar shall contact that counsel. If the counsel is willing and ready to represent the person, the Registrar shall facilitate the issuance of a power of attorney for this counsel by the person.

2. If the person entitled to legal assistance chooses a counsel not on the list of counsel who is willing and ready to represent him or her and to be included in the list, the Registrar shall decide on the eligibility of that counsel in accordance with regulation 70 and, upon inclusion in the list, shall facilitate the issuance of a power of attorney. Until the filing of a power of attorney, the person entitled to legal assistance may be represented by duty counsel in accordance with regulation 73".

The classic problem in domestic legal systems concerning choice of counsel on legal aid is the low tariff, in effect discouraging more senior and expert lawyers from agreeing to take such cases. Remuneration at the international tribunals is however sufficient to attract top notch professionals.

The ad hoc Tribunals have adopted a rule requiring that counsel be either admitted to the practice of law in a State or be a university professor of law[120]. The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Court are somewhat different, and focus on substance rather than form, requiring that "counsel for the defence shall have established competence in international or criminal law and procedure, as well as the necessary relevant experience, whether as judge, prosecutor, advocate or in other similar capacity, in criminal proceedings". Counsel must have a minimum of ten years of relevant experience, and shall not have been convicted of "a serious criminal or disciplinary offence considered to be incompatible with the nature of the office of counsel before the Court"[121]. Defence counsel must also have "an excellent knowledge of and be fluent in at least one of the working languages of the Court"[122]. In the Darfur Situation, the Pre-Trial Chamber instructed the Registrar to appoint ad hoc counsel for the defence who was not only fluent in one of the working languages, but who was also capable of working in Arabic[123]. The Registrar may remove lawyers from the list of counsel for various disciplinary factors[124].

The Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence establish norms that apply to defence counsel, including a Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel to be adopted by the Assembly of States Parties pursuant to a proposal from the Registrar, following consultation with the Prosecutor[125].

The accused is entitled to be informed of the right to counsel. In practice, this is unlikely to pose any problem. 32

δ) Free legal assistance

In the ICCPR, the right to funded counsel for indigent defendants is subject to the requirement that this be in cases "where the interests of justice so require". Arguably, this will be the situation in all cases before the ICC. Indeed, the ILC removed the condition in its Draft Statute[126], only to have it introduced again by the Preparatory Committee[127]. Consequently, the 33

120 Supra note 85, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, rule 44.
121 Supra note 33, Regulations of the Court, regulation 67.
122 Supra note 54, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, rule 22.
123 Situation in Darfur (ICC-02/05), Décision du Greffier relative à la nomination de Me Hadi Shalluf en qualité de conseil ad hoc de la Défense, 25 Aug. 2006, p. 2.
124 Supra note 33, Regulations of the Court, regulation 71; supra note 30, Regulations of the Registry, regulation 122 et seq.
125 Supra note 54, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, rule 8.
126 Supra note 15, 1994 ILC Draft Statute, p. 116. See also: Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, U.N. Doc. A/51/332 (1996), article 11 (e).
127 Supra note 19, Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997.

3160

rule is not an absolute one, although it is hard to imagine an example of a matter before the Court where the interests of justice would not require funded counsel for an indigent defendant

34 The most far-reaching discussion of this provision took place in the informal working group at the August 1996 session of the Preparatory Committee. There, a number of practical recommendations were made, closely following the practice of the ad hoc tribunals[128]. A detailed codification of principles governing the appointment of counsel was also set out at that time[129].

35 Administration of the system of legal aid to indigent defendants is the responsibility of the Registrar[130]. Legal aid is to encompass all that is necessary for "effective and efficient defence, including the remuneration of counsel"[131]. The right to counsel includes a right to adequate, qualified counsel. Unlike situations where a defendant chooses and remunerates counsel, when counsel are authorized and funded by the Court, it becomes responsible for their competence[132].

The experience of the ad hoc Tribunals shows that it is likely that counsel will be remunerated by the Tribunal in virtually all cases, given the fact that defendants, even if they were once powerful rulers who looted their countries before losing power, become suddenly and mysteriously impoverished at the time of indictment. The first defendant to come before the Court, Thomas Lubanga, was declared indigent and provided with Court-appointed counsel[133]. The Regulations of the Court indicate the criteria for determining eligibility for legal aid[134].

36 Legal assistance before the ad hoc Tribunals has had a turbulent history, and practice appears to differ between The Hague and Arusha. David Tolbert, who has worked in several senior positions with the ICTY over the years, describes the defence counsel and legal aid systems as 'the ICTY's Achilles' heel'[135].

(e) Rights of the defence

37 The first sentence of article 67 para. 1 (e) is virtually identical, aside from the changes to gender neutral terminology, to the text of article 14 para. 3 (e) of the ICCPR. The second sentence, dealing with entitlement to raise defences, is an original contribution.

α) Examination of witnesses

38 The ILC attempted to rewrite somewhat the ICCPR provision dealing with examination of witnesses, limiting the application of the right to prosecution witnesses, and thereby eliminating witnesses called by the Court on its own motion from the scope of the provision[136]. The Preparatory Committee adopted the language of the ILC[137] but the Rome Conference, in its wisdom, returned to the original ICCPR text[138]. According to Judge Vohrah, of the ICTY:

---

128 Supra note 18, 1996 Preparatory Committee I, para. 272.

129 Ibid., pp. 197-199.

130 Supra note 54, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, rule 21; supra note 30, Regulations of the Registry, regulation 130 et seq.

131 Supra note 33, Regulations of the Court, regulation 83.

132 The Right to a Fair Trial, Report to the U.N. Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities by Mr. S. Chernichenko and Mr. W. Treat on The Administration of Justice and the Human Rights of Detainees, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/1991/29, paras. 54-57.

133 Prosecutor v. Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06, Décision du Greffier sur la demande de l'aide judiciaire aux frais de la Cour déposée par M. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 31 Mar. 2006.

134 Supra note 33, Regulations of the Court, regulation 84.

135 David Tolbert, The ICTY and Defence Counsel: A Troubled Relationship, 37 NEW ENGLAND L. J. 975 (2003).

136 Supra note 15, 1994 ILC Draft Statute, p. 116, article 41.

137 Supra note 78, 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 199; supra note 19, Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 35; supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 114; supra note 20, Draft Statute, p. 127.

138 Supra note 22; Draft proposal for article 67; supra note 22, Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters (4 July), pp. 4-5; supra note 22, Compendium of draft articles, pp. 41-42. But see: supra note 74,

"The principle is intended in an ordinary trial to ensure that the Defence has means to prepare and present its case equal to those available to the Prosecution which has all the advantages of the State on its side ... [T]he European Commission of Human Rights equates the principle of equality of arms with the right of the accused to have procedural equality with the Prosecution"[139].

It is foreseeable that there be certain limits to this right. The formal provisions governing testimony of victims of sexual crimes is an example. Article 68 para. 2 enables the Court to allow the presentation of evidence by electronic or other special means. Of course, this is not a breach of article 67 para. 1 (e) unless it is read as including a right to cross-examination and to confrontation. 39

During the Preparatory Committee sessions, the issue was presented as a right to "confront and cross-examine all witnesses"[140]. But the wording of the provision is based on an international model which recognizes the legitimacy of trials without confrontation of witnesses and cross-examination, at least in the sense of common law procedure[141]. Article 14 of the ICCPR was not intended to impose a common law model on domestic justice systems, and those which do not indulge in cross-examination of witnesses before the Court cannot be considered, prima facie, to be in breach of the international norm. Thus, although the defence has the right to examine witnesses on the same basis as the Prosecutor, there is no explicit provision for a full right to cross-examination, as it is understood in the common law. The Regulations further confirm this perspective:

"Subject to the Statute and the Rules, the Presiding Judge, in consultation with the other members of the Chamber, shall determine the mode and order of questioning witnesses and presenting evidence so as to:
(a) Make the questioning of witnesses and the presentation of evidence fair and effective for the determination of the truth..."[142].

Under continental or Romano-Germanic legal systems, questions may be posed by the judge at the request of counsel. At trial, the presiding judge may issue directions as to the conduct of the proceedings[143], failing which the Prosecutor and the defence are to agree on the order and the manner in which evidence is to be presented[144]. Witnesses are questioned by the party that presents them, followed by questioning by the other party and by the Court. The defence has the right to be the last to examine a witness[145].

Nothing in the Statute provides for compellability of witnesses, for example by issuance of subpoenae or similar orders to appear before the Court. Although this may create hardship for the defence, it does not seem that it can argue that the right to a fair trial is being denied because of the impossibility of obtaining witnesses and compelling their attendance in court.

There are limits to the right to examine witnesses. The formal provisions governing the testimony of victims of sexual crimes are an example. In such circumstances, the Statute authorises the Court to allow the presentation of evidence by electronic or other special means[146]. Some questions are out of bounds: the Rules of Procedure and Evidence state that evidence of the prior or subsequent sexual conduct of a victim or witness is not to be admitted[147]. It may also disallow questions because they are abusive or repetitive. What is important is that the parties, prosecution and defence, be treated equally and that the trial be fundamentally fair.

---

139 Proposal submitted by the Delegations of Egypt, Oman and the Syrian Arab Republic, p. 1.
140 Prosecutor v. Tadić, Case No. IT-94-1-T, Separate Opinion of Judge Vohrah on Prosecution Motion for Production of Defence Witness statements, 27 Nov. 1996, p. 4.
141 Supra note 18, 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 58, para. 275.
142 F.G. Jacobs/R.C.A. White, THE EUROPEAN CONVENTION ON HUMAN RIGHTS 158 (1996).
143 Supra note 33, Regulations of the Court, regulation 43.
144 Supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 64 para. 8 (b).
145 Supra note 54, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, rule 140 para. 1.
146 Ibid., rule 140 para. 2.
147 Supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 68 para. 2.
148 Supra note 54, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, rule 71.

The Statute also allows the Court to recognise witness privileges. The Assembly of States Parties agreed to confirm a principle already recognised by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, by which the International Committee of the Red Cross has a right to non-disclosure of evidence obtained by a former employee in the course of official duties. The Tribunal relied on customary international law in reaching its decision[148]. The Rules also recognise solicitor client privilege, and enable the Court to extend privilege to other categories of witnesses[149]. It has been suggested that on this basis privilege might be extended to other non-governmental organisations with humanitarian purposes, and bodies such as a truth and reconciliation commission.

β) Defences

40 The second sentence of subparagraph (e) recognizes the right of the accused to raise defences and to present other admissible evidence. The Preparatory Committee had appended to the provision, in square brackets, a sentence stating: "In addition the accused shall also be entitled to present any other evidence"[150]. At Rome, the Chair of the Working Group added the reference to raising defences[151].

41 These rights must surely be included within the general principle of the right to a fair trial, established in the chapeau of article 67 para. 1. Moreover, defences are described in considerable detail in Part 2 of the Statute, concerning general principles of law. It should be observed that some defences are formally excluded by Part 2, namely the defence of official capacity[152], lack of knowledge (in the case of command responsibility)[153] and superior orders (in cases of genocide and crimes against humanity)[154].

(f) Interpreter

42 The provision in the ICC Statute is considerably more detailed than the corresponding text in the ICCPR although it is doubtful whether anything really new has been added. Article 14 para. 3 (f) recognizes the right to "free assistance of an interpreter" if the accused "cannot understand or speak the language used in court"[155]. Here, too, the ILC attempted to improve on the text of the ICCPR, adding the requirement that the interpreter be "competent", specifying extension of the principle to include documents, and modifying the requirement that the accused either understand or speak the language to become a cumulative requirement, "understands and speaks"[156]. The Statute provision is essentially identical to the ILC Draft, except for the order of the phrases. These were reversed at the August 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee[157], and the word "fully" added during the Rome Conference[158].

---

148 Ibid., Rule 73 (3), (4), (5), confirming: Prosecutor v. Simić et al., Case No. IT-95-9-PT, Decision on the Prosecution Motion Under Rule 73 for a Ruling Concerning the Testimony of a Witness, 27 July 1999.

149 Supra note 54, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, rule 73.

150 Supra note 18, 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 199; supra note 19, Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 35; supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 114; supra note 20, Draft Statute, p. 127.

151 Supra note 22Draft proposal for article 67.

152 Supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 27.

153 Ibid., article 28.

154 Ibid., article 33.

155 Specific responsibility for ensuring respect of this right lies with the registry: supra note 30, Regulations of the Registry, regulation 40.

156 Supra note 15, 1994 ILC Draft Statute, p. 115, article 41. For a particularly interesting discussion of the difficulties of trials with interpreters, see Prosecutor v. Akayesu, Case No. ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment of 2 Sep 1998.

157 Supra note 19, Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 35; supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, pp. 114-115; supra note 20, Draft Statute, pp. 114-115; supra note 22, Draft proposal for article 67.

158 Supra note 76, Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters (11 July), pp. 3-4; supra note 22, Compendium of draft articles, pp. 5-7.

3163

An accused who does not understand the proceedings is not "present" at trial. Thus, the right to an interpreter seems axiomatic. Supervision of the quality of such interpretation is a constant difficulty, however, because frequently the accused is the only person who is actually listening to the interpretation. Although the requirement that documents be translated may be cumbersome, time-consuming and costly, it has been recognized by the European Court of Human Rights as a corollary of the right to an interpreter[159]. 43

The provision does not require interpretation into the accused's mother tongue, or into a language of the accused's choice[160]. In an interlocutory ruling, the ICTY denied an accused's request for a "Croatian" interpreter, given that the languages are similar enough and there was regular translation of Serbo-Croatian[161]. 44

(g) Right to silence

The right to silence provision is also based on the norm in article 14 para. 3 of the ICCPR, but goes considerably farther. The ICCPR says that an accused has the right "[n]ot to be compelled to testify against himself or to confess guilt". The ICC Statute removes the qualification "against himself", and adds an additional norm that is not at all implicit in the ICCPR, namely that the silence of an accused cannot be a consideration in the determination of guilt or innocence. 45

The words "against himself" were removed by the ILC in its Draft Statute, but otherwise the text of article 14 para. 3 (g) remained intact[162]. But this is not the same as the general right against self-incrimination found in the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution, because the right may only be invoked by an accused[163]. The text clarifies the fact that an accused may refuse to testify altogether, and not merely to testify when the evidence is "against himself". 46

The second arm of the provision, providing that silence includes the right not to have it invoked against an accused, was added during the August 1997 Preparatory Committee[164]. Without square brackets, it sailed along effortlessly into the final version of the Statute[165], although at the Rome Conference the United Kingdom made an interesting proposal that changed the form without modifying the content[166]. The provision reflects concerns with encroachments upon the right to silence in some national justice systems. Specifically, English common law has always prevented any adverse inference being drawn from an accused's failure to testify. But in recent years, legislation adopted within the United Kingdom now allows prosecutors to propose such conclusions[167]. 47

At the ad hoc tribunals, the right to silence has arisen in proceedings concerning provisional release, where prosecutors argued that the silence of the accused is a pejorative factor militating

---

159 Supra note 79.Luedicke, Belkacem und Koc v. Federal Republic of Germany, para. 48; Kamasinski v. Federal Republic of Germany, Ser. A, No. 168, 19 Dec. 1989, para. 74.

160 Guesdon v. France (No. 219/1986), U.N. Doc. A/44/40, p. 222, paras. 10.2, 10.3.

161 Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., Case No. IT-96-21-T, Order on Zdravko Mucić's Oral Request for Croatian Interpretation, 23 June 1997.

162 Supra note 15, 1994 ILC Draft Statute, p. 116, article 41.

163 According to supra note 18, 1996 Preparatory Committee I, para. 276, "The right of the accused not to be compelled to give testimony was supported, as was the right of witnesses to enjoy some degree of protection from giving self-incriminating testimony". But article 67 does not apply to witnesses, who have no general protection against self-incrimination.

164 Supra note 19, Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 35; supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 117; supra note 20, Draft Statute, p. 127.

165 supra note 22, Draft proposal for article 67; supra note 22, Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters (4 July), pp. 4-5; supra note 22, Compendium of draft articles, pp. 41-42.

166 Supra note 41, Proposal submitted by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, p. 1: "Neither to be compelled to testify nor to confess guilt and to be permitted to remain silent without any inference as to guilt or innocence being drawn from such silence".

167 Criminal Justice and Public Order Act (1994), s. 4 (3).

3104

against release. But Trial Chambers have said that "lack of co-operation of an accused should not, as a rule, be taken into consideration as a factor" that might justify denying an application for provisional release. According to an ICTY Trial Chamber, "[t]he alternative would easily result in infringement of the fundamental right of an accused to remain silent"[168].

Cooperation with the Prosecutor may be cited as a mitigating factor at the sentencing stage, and to this extent there may be a price to be paid by an accused for exercising the right to silence. However, Trial Chambers have frequently insisted that the fact the accused does not plead guilty should not be viewed as an aggravating factor,"since an accused person has no obligation to do so and he has the right to remain silent should he choose that course"[169]. In Niyitegeka, an ICTR Trial Chamber wrote:

> The Accused chose not to testify in his own defence in the present case. The Defence made submissions concerning the right to remain silent and the right not to testify. The Chamber is mindful of the Accused's rights in this regard and has not drawn any adverse inference in the present case[170].

In Čelebići, the ICTY Appeals Chamber said there is 'an absolute prohibition against consideration of silence in the determination of guilt or innocence is guaranteed within the Statute and the Rules... Similarly, this absolute prohibition must extend to an inference being drawn in the determination of sentence'[171].

The right to silence can of course be waived. An accused who pleads guilty in effect waives the right to silence, as well as certain other procedural rights[172]. This is often spelled out in plea agreements at the ad hoc tribunals[173]. Many accused before international tribunals have chosen to testify in their own defence. In the case of a defence of alibi, for example, it is virtually essential that the accused take the witness stand in order to explain his or her whereabouts at the time of the crime.

(h) Unsworn statement

48 The idea that an accused is entitled to make an unsworn oral or written statement in his or her defence, at least as a fundamental right, is a genuine innovation. There is nothing comparable in any of the international human rights instruments. But it is a practice recognized under many criminal codes throughout the world. In fact, continental European jurists are "astonished" that it could be otherwise, as in their jurisdictions the accused is never sworn[174]. The proposal first surfaced during the informal working group of the August 1996 session of the Preparatory Committee[175]. It was retained, in square brackets, by the Working Group in August 1997[176], and adopted without difficulty at the Rome Conference[177].

---

168 Prosecutor v. Jokić et al., Cases No. IT-01-42-PT and IT-01-46-PT, Orders on Motions for Provisional Release, 20 Feb. 2002. Also: Prosecutor v. Hadžihasanović et al., Case No. IT-01-47-PT, Decisions Granting Provisional Release to Enver Hadžihasanović, Mehmed Alagic and Amir Kubura, 9 Dec. 2001, para. 15.

169 Prosecutor v. Vasiljević, Case No. IT-98-32-T, Judgment, 29 Nov. 2002, para. 298; Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., IT-96-21-A, Judgment, 20 Feb. 2001, para. 783; Prosecutor v. Plavšić, Case No. IT-00-39&40/1, Sentencing Judgment, 27 Feb. 2003, para. 64; Prosecutor v. Blaškić, Case No. IT-95-14-A, Judgment, 29 July 2004, para. 687.

170 Prosecutor v. Niyitegeka, Case No. ICTR-96-14-T, Judgment and Sentence, 16 May 2003, para. 46.

171 Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., Case No. IT-96-21-A, Judgment, 20 Feb. 2001, para. 783. Also: Prosecutor v. Plavšić, Case No. IT-00-39&40/1, Sentencing Judgment, 27 Feb. 2003, para. 64.

172 Prosecutor v. Sikirica et al., Case No. IT-95-8, Sentencing Judgment, 13 Nov. 2001, para. 17.

173 See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Obrenović, Case No. IT-02-60-T, Plea Agreement, para. 17; Prosecutor v. Momir Nikolić, Case No. IT-02-60-PT, Amended Plea Agreement, para. 5.

174 J. Pradel, DROIT PÉNAL COMPARÉ 449, fn. 1 (1995).

175 Supra note 78, 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 117, 200.

176 Supra note 18, 1996 Preparatory Committee I, p. 35; supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 117; supra note 20, Draft Statute, p. 128.

177 Supra note 22, Draft proposal for article 67; supra note 22, Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters (4 July), pp. 4-5; supra note 22, Compendium of draft articles, pp. 41-42. See also: supra note 74, Proposal submitted by the Delegations of Egypt, Oman and the Syrian Arab Republic, p. 1.

3165

Under common law systems, an unsworn statement would in principle be inadmissible as evidence. If the accused chooses to testify, then he or she must be sworn and, moreover, must submit to cross-examination. Article 69 para. 1 requires every witness to "give an undertaking as to the truthfulness of the evidence to be given by that witness". In so doing, the witness submits to the possibility of prosecution for perjured testimony[178]. Although there is a lack of consistency with the terminology used in article 67 para. 1 (h), logically, testimony subsequent to the undertaking as to truthfulness must be the equivalent of a "sworn statement". Therefore, the "unsworn statement" seems to present itself as an exception to the general rule requiring that testimony be accompanied by an undertaking as to truthfulness. Although the judges cannot consider the accused's decision not to testify as a factor influencing guilt or innocence, pursuant to article 67 para. 1 (g), this surely does not require them to attribute the same weight to the unsworn statement of an accused as they would to sworn testimony. But an alternative view suggests that the unsworn statement is not evidence at all. If it is not, then the Court may not base its judgment on "facts" revealed in the course of the unsworn statement[179]. An accused who believes the unsworn statement is a way to introduce evidence might have an unfortunate surprise if the Court, in its final judgment, indicates that it does not consider such "facts" as being part of the record. 49

(i) Reverse onus

The prohibition of any reverse onus or duty or rebuttal is really a corollary of the presumption of innocence, protected by article 66 of the ICC Statute. Reverse onus provisions are common to most criminal law systems. Upon proof of one fact, the Court is entitled, or in some cases is obliged, to conclude that another fact has been proven. Thus, the prosecution does not in reality prove a decisive fact in the case against the accused. The accused bears the onus of disproving such a fact, sometimes by raising a reasonable doubt as to its existence, and sometimes by actually proving the contrary, according to the principle of preponderance of evidence. Although many offences in national criminal codes are drafted in such a fashion, there are no examples in the ICC Statute. This does not mean that a reverse onus issue may not arise. For example, in the Čelebići trial before the ICTY, the Trial Chamber noted that "there is a presumption of sanity of the person alleged to have committed the offence"[180] and that the accused who raises a defence of insanity or diminished mental capacity "is to rebut the presumption of sanity"[181]. This question is discussed in greater detail in the commentary on article 66, particularly margin Nos. 18-22. 50

The provision was not included in the ILC Draft Statute, nor did it form part of the first series of amendments, during the 1996 sessions of the Preparatory Committee. Article 67 para. 1 (i) was proposed during the August 1997 meeting, although it was left in square brackets[182]. It posed no problem during the debates at Rome and was adopted promptly[183]. 51

3166

[178] Supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 70 para. 1 (a).
[179] Ibid., article 74 para. 2.
[180] Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., Case No. IT-96-21-T, Judgment, 16 Nov. 1998, para. 1157.
[181] Ibid., para. 1158.
[182] Supra note 19, Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 35; also: supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 155; supra note 20, Draft Statute, p. 128. Note the error in the nota bene at the end of article 60 in the Zutphen Draft. The reference is to paragraph 1 in general, and not to subparagraph 1 (j). The error is corrected in the Draft Statute of April 1998.
[183] Supra note 22, Draft proposal for article 67, p. 5; supra note 22, Compendium of draft articles, p. 42; Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/L.76/Add.6, p. 5.

II. Paragraph 2

52 International human rights law is somewhat uncertain as to an obligation on the prosecution to disclose evidence to the defence prior to trial. Although the instruments impose no clear duty in this respect[184], recently, the European Court of Human Rights has declared "that it is a requirement of fairness ... that the prosecution authorities disclose to the defence all material evidence for or against the accused"[185]. The Rules of the ad hoc Tribunals make detailed provision for disclosure of the prosecution case and, according to recent amendments, for the defence case as well[186]. A duty on the prosecution to disclose its evidence, both exculpatory and inculpatory, is now recognized in many legal systems[187]. Existence of a reciprocal duty on the defence is less common although in some cases, such as a defence of alibi, the credibility of the defence will depend on prompt disclosure of material facts[188]. In an interlocutory decision in the Tadić case, Judge Stephen said the defence has "no disclosure obligation at all unless an alibi or a special defence is sought to be relied upon and then only to a quite limited extent ..."[189]. It is obvious that the defence can never be required to disclose inculpatory evidence, as this would violate the right against self-incrimination set out in paragraph (g).

53 In an effort to clarify this point, the ILC proposed the following provisions, to comprise a second paragraph in the article on rights of the accused: "Exculpatory evidence that becomes available to the Procuracy prior to the conclusion of the trial shall be made available to the defence. In case of doubt as to the application of this paragraph or as to the admissibility of the evidence, the Trial Chamber shall decide"[190]. At the August 1996 session of the Preparatory Committee, delegates observed that it was fundamental to a fair trial that provision be made for the full disclosure of evidence by the Prosecutor to the defence, and not only exculpatory evidence, as well as a reciprocal duty of disclosure on the part of the defence[191]. At Rome, a new version submitted by Australia formed the basis of debate[192]. The Drafting Committee added, at the beginning of the Australian text, the words "[i]n addition to any other disclosure provided for in this Statute ...". Australia had left two options as to the body competent for resolving questions about whether or not disclosure was required, the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Trial Chamber. The Preparatory Committee did not choose either, leaving the matter to "the Court"[193].

54 It is perhaps unfortunate that the obligation on the prosecution to disclose all relevant evidence is not explicitly included within the provision concerning rights of the defence. It is surely implicit in the general right to a "fair hearing" found within the chapeau of article 67, especially in light of recent case law of international human rights tribunals. Moreover, article

---

184 The closest is Principle 21 of the United Nations Basic Principles on the Role of Lawyers, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.144/28/Rev.1 (1990): "It is the duty of the competent authorities to ensure lawyers access to appropriate information, files and documents in their possession or control in sufficient time to enable lawyers to provide effective legal assistance to their clients".

185 Edwards v. United Kingdom, Ser. A, No. 247B, 16 Dec. 1992.

186 Supra note 85, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Rule 66. See: supra note 32, A.-M. La Rosa, 974.

187 Supra note 174, J. Pradel, 414-420.

188 Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970).

189 Prosecutor v. Tadić, Case No. IT-94-1-T, Separate opinion of Judge Stephen on prosecution motion for production of defence witness statements, 27 Nov. 1996.

190 Supra note 15, 1994 ILC Draft Statute, p. 115.

191 Supra note 18, 1996 Preparatory Committee I, para. 274, p. 58.

192 Proposal submitted by Australia, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.35 (29 June), p. 1: "The Prosecutor shall, as soon as practicable, disclose to the defence evidence in the Prosecutor's possession or control which he or she believes shows or tends to show the innocence of the accused, or to mitigate the guilt of the accused, or which may affect the credibility of prosecution evidence. In case of doubt as to the application of this paragraph, the [Pre-Trial Chamber/Trial Chamber] shall decide". There were other proposals relating to article 67 para. 2: supra note 41, Proposal submitted by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, p. 1; supra note 74, Proposal submitted by the Delegations of Egypt, Oman and the Syrian Arab Republic, p. 1.

193 Supra note 22, Draft proposal for article 67; supra note 76, Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters (11 July), pp. 3-4.

64 of the Statute, entitled "Functions and powers of the Trial Chamber", requires that the Trial Chamber "ensure that a trial is fair and expeditious and is conducted with full respect for the rights of the accused". In this context, the Statute imposes upon the Trial Chamber assigned to deal with a case the obligation ("the Trial Chamber ... shall"; the ILC Draft had left this to the discretion of the Presidency[194]) "[s]ubject to any other relevant provisions of this Statute, [to] provide for disclosure of documents or information not previously disclosed, sufficiently in advance of the commencement of the trial to enable adequate preparation for trial". The relevant provisions that may qualify somewhat this duty on the prosecution are article 68 para. 5, concerning protection of witnesses, and article 72 para. 1, concerning protection of national security information, which makes express reference to article 67 para. 2.

The ICTY has set guidelines for disclosure pursuant to its rule 66. The Tribunal has concluded that documents and other objects "material to the preparation of the Defence" consist of material that is "... significantly helpful to an understanding of important inculpatory or exculpatory evidence; it is material if there is a strong indication that ... it will 'play an important role in uncovering admissible evidence, aiding witness preparation, corroborating testimony, or assisting impeachment or rebuttal'"[195]. 55

The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Court establish a thorough regime of disclosure, applicable to both Prosecutor and defence. The prosecution is required to provide the defence with the names of witnesses it intends to call at trial together with copies of their statements, subject to certain exceptions relating to the protection of the witnesses themselves[196]. The defence has a corresponding obligation with respect to witnesses, although this is worded slightly more narrowly, applying only to those expected to support specific defences[197]. Both sides are required to allow the other to inspect books, documents, photographs and other tangible objects in their possession or control which they intend to use as evidence. The Prosecutor must also disclose any such items that may assist the defence, although a comparable duty is not imposed upon the defence to disclose items that might assist the prosecution[198].

The second sentence of article 67 para. 2 provides for a determination by the Court in cases where the prosecution is not sure about the nature of the evidence. An early amendment described this as a hearing "ex parte" and "in camera"[199]. The August 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee included a cross-reference to the provision enabling the Court to make orders for the conduct of the trial (now article 64 para. 3)[200]. Given that there are obligations of disclosure at both the pre-trial and the trial phase, and that the obligation set out in article 67 para. 2 must be respected "as soon as practicable", the appropriate body would be either the Pre-Trial Chamber or the Trial Chamber, depending on the circumstances. It is unclear whether this provision entitles the Prosecutor to seek a ruling in cases of doubt, or whether the defence could also apply where it suspects the Prosecution may have such evidence. There may be circumstances where the Prosecutor cannot seek such a determination without informing the Court of the evidence in question, and it would obviously defeat the purpose of the provision to allow the defence access to such evidence prior to the determination by the Court that it must be disclosed. Yet the defence is entitled to be present at trial, and the trial must be public. Should the Court decide to conduct some form of ex parte determination, this must be done with the 56

194 Supra note 15, 1994 ILC Draft Statute, article 27 para. 5 (b), p. 95.
195 Prosecutor v. Delalić et al., Case No. IT-96-21-T, Decision on the Motion by the Accused Zejnil Delalić for the Disclosure of Evidence, 26 Sep. 1996.
196 Supra note 54, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, rule 76.
197 Ibid., rule 79.
198 Ibid., rules 77–78.
199 Supra note 78, 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 200.
200 Supra note 19, Preparatory Committee Decisions Aug. 1997, p. 35; also: supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 115; supra note 20, Draft Statute, p. 128.

greatest discretion. The Court might consider appointing a amicus curiae to ensure that the rights of the defence are protected and to assess, in appropriate circumstances, the usefulness of an appeal of its decision pursuant to article 81 para. 2 (d) of the Statute.

C. Special Remarks

1. Omitted provisions

57 The drafts of article 67 that were considered by the Preparatory Committee contained two provisions based rather closely on the United States constitutional model rather than the international instruments. The first concerned the protection against unreasonable search and seizure[201], while the second provided a guarantee not to be deprived of life or liberty without due process[202]. Another proposal entitled the accused to invoke the Court's power to compel state co-operation in order to assist the defence in the preparation of its case[203]. They were deleted at the Rome Conference[204]. The due process proposal is derived from article V of the United States Bill of Rights, which is an anachronistic provision, in that it recognizes the legitimacy of capital punishment, something which is excluded from the Rome Statute[205] and prohibited by contemporary human rights norms[206]. In any case, the notion of "due process" is comprised within that of "fair trial" in the chapeau of article 67 para. 1. Search and seizure, too, is governed by other provisions in the Statute. The protection against unreasonable search and seizure in effect enables a court to sanction misconduct at the investigation stage. Here, the Court has the power to exclude evidence, pursuant to article 69 para. 7 (b), where its admission "would be antithetical to and would seriously damage the integrity of the proceedings". Finally, the state co-operation provision is also incorporated in other provisions of the Statute.

2. Role of article 67 in the applicable law

58 Article 67 closely resembles article 14 para. 3 of the ICCPR, as well as the various fair trial clauses found in national constitutions. It is not, however, a typical provision found within criminal or penal codes as such. In effect, such clauses generally belong in constitution-type instruments, and claim a judicial role which is hierarchically superior to the criminal law texts that they frame and control. It is against the constitutional fair trial standard that provisions of the ordinary criminal law, as well as actions of the authorities in implementing it, including those of the Courts, are to be assessed. In national legal systems, two principal consequences result: where a provision of the ordinary criminal law is in conflict with the fundamental fair trial norm, the former must give way to the latter; where the investigating authorities, the prosecution or the Courts themselves have breached the fair trial rights of the accused, the

---

201 Supra note 78, 1996 Preparatory Committee II, pp. 200-201; supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 115; supra note 20, Draft Statute, p. 128.

202 Supra note 78, 1996 Preparatory Committee II, p. 201; supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 115; supra note 20, Draft Statute, p. 128.

203 Supra note 20, Zutphen Draft, p. 115; supra note 20, Draft Statute, p. 128.

204 See also: supra note 74, Proposal submitted by the Delegations of Egypt, Oman and the Syrian Arab Republic, p. 1.

205 Supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 77.

206 Protocol No. 6 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms Concerning the Abolition of the Death Penalty, E.T.S. No. 114, entered into force 30 Mar. 1985; Protocol No. 13 to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms Concerning the Abolition of the Death Penalty in all Circumstances, E.T.S. No. 187, entered into force 7 Jan. 2003; Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights Aiming at Abolition of the Death Penalty, G.A. Res. 44/128, entered into force 7 July 1991; Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights to Abolish the Death Penalty, O.A.S.T.S. No. 73, 29 I.L.M. 1447, entered into force 6 Oct. 1993. See W.A. Schabas, THE ABOLITION OF THE DEATH PENALTY IN INTERNATIONAL LAW (3rd ed. 2003).

Courts must grant an appropriate remedy, which may range from compensation to an order for a new trial and even, in some systems, the right to a stay of proceedings.

The application of these concepts to the ICC Statute is not obvious, and this raises questions about the role of article 67 itself within the general structure and legal philosophy of the Statute. To take the case of a breach of article 67 by the investigating authorities, the prosecution or the Courts, a number of scenarios may be contemplated. Although article 67 applies at the trial stage of the proceedings, it may be threatened by pre-trial events, such as irregular or illegal investigation, either by the national authorities or by the Prosecutor's office. The Statute provides the Court with the power to exclude evidence in cases of abuse[207] but there may be breaches of article 67 for which this may be an insufficient or inappropriate remedy. For example, what is the Court to do in cases of a violation of the right to a speedy trial, set out in article 67 para. 1 (c)? An acquittal would be inappropriate, because there would be nothing to suggest the innocence of the accused, and such a finding would offend the victims. The obvious remedy would be to suspend or stay the proceedings, but no such power is set out, at least explicitly, within the Statute. Moreover, it would seem unlikely that the Court will intervene to sanction what would quite possibly be, in effect, its own shortcomings. The accused is also entitled to a fair trial "in full equality", which must surely mean that he or she is protected from abusive prosecution based, for example, on prohibited criteria such as race, national origin or gender. The only conceivable remedy would be a stay of proceedings, as the Court must prevent abuse of its own process by the Prosecutor. Other examples abound, as a cursory review of constitutional jurisprudence of national courts indicates. 59

Even more difficult is the problem of applicable law that is incompatible with article 67. In some cases, provisions of the Statute are explicitly protected from conflict with article 67. For example, article 67 para. 1 (d) employs the words "[s]ubject to article 63, paragraph 2 ...". In others, it was surely the intent to the Statute's drafters to except other provisions from the scope of article 67. For example, despite the right to "raise defences" set out in article 67 para. 1 (e), this cannot be unlimited, because other provisions of the Statute prohibit or limit the defences of official capacity and superior orders. What if a provision of the applicable law is not sheltered, either implicitly or explicitly, from article 67? Can the Court determine that it is inoperative to the extent that there is an incompatibility with the provisions of article 67? If the Court may indeed make such a determination, does this only cover procedural issues or does it also concern substantive law? 60

It is suggested that article 67, given its unique formulation and its historical origin, may be entitled to a form of hierarchically superior status within the Statute. In appropriate cases, some of which may have been unthinkable in July 1998 but which may become apparent over time, the Court may be required to declare provisions of the Statute inoperative because they conflict with article 67. The "fair trial" norm in the chapeau of article 67 para. 1 is a powerful concept and one that will evolve, in keeping with the development of international human rights law. Provisions of the Statute that meet the fair trial standard in 1998 may no longer do so at some point in the future. 61

But for the sake of argument, even if it is assumed that the other norms in the Statute are either compatible with article 67 or else they are implicit or explicit exceptions to it, it must be born in mind that much of the applicable law remains to be devised. The two other principal sources, the Rules of Procedure and Evidence and the Elements of Crimes, are hierarchically subordinate to the Statute. Article 52 para. 5 of the Rome Statute declares that in the event of conflict between it and the Rules, the Statute shall prevail. Rules of evidence adopted by the Assembly of States Parties may conflict with fair trial rights enshrined in article 67[208], and the [207] Supra note 4, Rome Statute, article 69 para. 7 (b).

[208] For an example drawn from the Rules of the ICTY, see: A.-M. La Rosa, Défi de taille pour les Tribunaux pénaux internationaux: conciliation des exigences du droit international humanitaire et d'une procédure

3170

Court is clearly entitled to disregard them or declare them inoperative in such cases. Moreover, the wording of article 67 – particularly its reference to defences and to onus of proof – suggests that this extends to substantive as well as procedural matters.

équitable, 828 REV. INT'L CROIX-ROUGE 677, 680-684 (1997).

5718

An Introduction to the International Criminal Court

Third Edition

William A. Schabas

3172

5799

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS
Cambridge, New York, Melbourne, Madrid, Cape Town, Singapore, São Paulo

Cambridge University Press
The Edinburgh Building, Cambridge CB2 8RU, UK

Published in the United States of America by Cambridge University Press, New York

www.cambridge.org
Information on this title: www.cambridge.org/9780521707541

© William A Schabas 2001, 2004, 2007

This publication is in copyright. Subject to statutory exception and to the provisions of relevant collective licensing agreements, no reproduction of any part may take place without the written permission of Cambridge University Press.

First published 2007

Printed in the United Kingdom at the University Press, Cambridge

A catalogue record for this publication is available from the British Library

ISBN 978-0-521-88125-8 hardback
ISBN 978-0-521-70754-1 paperback

Cambridge University Press has no responsibility for the persistence or accuracy of URLs for external or third-party internet websites referred to in this book, and does not guarantee that any content on such websites is, or will remain, accurate or appropriate.

3173

5800

6

General principles of criminal law

The statutes of the Nuremberg and Tokyo tribunals, as well as those of the ad hoc tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, are very thin when it comes to what criminal lawyers call 'general principles'. Once the crimes were defined, the drafters of these earlier models left issues such as the appreciation of the evidence or the assessment of responsibility for accomplices and other 'secondary' offenders to the discretion of the judges. After all, those appointed to preside over these tribunals were eminent jurists in their own countries and could draw on a rich, multi-cultural resource of domestic criminal law practice. The Rome Statute is far less generous to the judges. It seeks to delimit in great detail any possible exercise of judicial discretion. Part 3 of the Statute, consisting of Articles 22–33, is entitled 'General principles of criminal law'.[1] It directs the Court on such issues as criminal participation, the mental element of crimes and the availability of various defences. But elsewhere in the Statute can be found other provisions that are also germane to the issue of general principles. They present a fascinating experiment in comparative criminal law, drawing upon elements from the common law, the Romano-Germanic system, Sharia law and other regimes of penal justice.

Sources of law

Article 21 of the Rome Statute, entitled 'Applicable law', sets out the legal sources upon which the International Criminal Court may draw. The [1] On the general principles, see Per Saland, 'International Criminal Law Principles', in Roy Lee, ed., The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results, The Hague: Kluwer Law International, 1999, pp. 189–216; William A. Schabas, 'General Principles of Criminal Law in the International Criminal Court Statute (Part III)', (1998) 6 European Journal of Crime, Criminal Law and Criminal Justice 84; Kai Ambos, 'General Principles of Law in the Rome Statute', (1999) 10 Criminal Law Forum 1; Robert Cryer, 'General Principles of Liability in International Criminal Law', in Dominic McGoldrick, Peter Rowe and Eric Donnelly, eds., The Permanent International Criminal Court: Legal and Policy Issues, Oxford and Portland, OR: Hart Publishing, 2004, pp. 233–62.

3174

humanitarian law instruments.[48] The general right to a 'fair hearing' established in the chapeau of Article 67 of the Statute provides defendants with a powerful tool to go beyond the text of the Statute, and to require that the Court's respect for the rights of an accused keep pace with the progressive development of human rights law. Although Article 67 is placed with the provisions dealing with the trial itself, the right to a fair hearing applies at all stages of the proceedings, and even during the investigation, when no defendant has even been identified.[49] The case law of the Strasbourg organs, established to implement the European Convention on Human Rights, has used this residual right to a fair hearing to fill in some of the gaps in the more specific provisions.[50] That the term 'fair hearing' invites the Court to exceed the precise terms of Article 67 in appropriate circumstances is confirmed by the reference within the chapeau to 'minimum guarantees'. As Judge Steiner, sitting as a single judge of Pre-Trial Chamber I, has noted, the reference to 'minimum guarantees' in Article 67(1) means that sometimes the competent Chamber will need to go beyond the terms of Article 67 itself. She cited the case law of the European Court of Human Rights in support.[51] The term 'fair hearing' also suggests that, where individual problems with specific rights set out in Article 67 do not, on their own, amount to a violation, the requirement of a fair hearing may allow a cumulative view and lead to the conclusion that there is a breach where there have been a number of apparently minor or less significant encroachments on Article 67.[52]

[48] Geneva Convention (III) Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, (1950) 75 UNTS 135, Arts. 84–87 and 99–108; Geneva Convention (IV) Relative to the Protection of Civilians, (1950) 75 UNTS 287, Arts. 5 and 64–76; Protocol Additional I to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts, (1979) 1125 UNTS 3, Art. 75; Protocol Additional II to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and Relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts, (1979) 1125 UNTS 3, Art. 6.

[49] Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo (ICC-01/04), Decision on the Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the Chamber's Decision of 17 January 2006 on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5 and VPRS 6, 31 March 2006, para. 35.

[50] D. J. Harris, M. O'Boyle and C. Warbrick, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, London: Butterworths, 1995, pp. 202–3.

[51] Lubanga (ICC-01/04–01/06), Décision relative au système définitif de divulgation et à l'établissment d'un échéancier, Annexe I, Analyse de la décisions relative au système définitif de divulgation, 15 May 2006, para. 97. Judge Steiner also referred to the previous edition of this book as authority for such a view.

[52] Stanford v. United Kingdom, Series A, No. 182-A, 30 August 1990, para. 24.

5802

DROIT PRIVÉ

PRÉCIS

Droit pénal général

Droit pénal général

Gaston Stefani
Georges Levasseur
Bernard Bouloc

17e édi

34544 St27
e17

DALLOZ

B176

5803

Droit pénal général

17e édition

2000

Gaston Stefani

Georges Levasseur
Professeur honoraire à l'Université de droit, d'économie et de sciences sociales de Paris

Bernard Bouloc
Professeur à l'Université Panthéon-Sorbonne (Paris I)

DALLOZ

AC

3177

5804

CHAPITRE 2
L'ÉLÉMENT MORAL

253 Nécessité de l'élément moral ◇ Pour que l'infraction existe juridiquement, il ne suffit pas qu'un acte matériel (élément matériel), prévu et puni par la loi pénale ait été commis, il faut encore que cet acte matériel ait été l'œuvre de la volonté de son auteur. Ce lien entre l'acte et l'auteur, que le droit anglais appelle la mens rea (la volonté criminelle) par opposition à l'actus reus (acte criminel), constitue l'élément moral [1]. Il faut que l'élément moral se joigne à l'élément matériel (qu'il apparaisse avant, après, ou au même moment) pour que l'infraction soit constituée [2].

Le législateur en effet ne punit que les conséquences antisociales d'un acte volontaire. En l'absence de volonté, en cas de force majeure par exemple, il n'y a pas d'infraction. Cela est vrai non seulement pour les infractions dites intentionnelles, telles que les crimes et la majorité des délits, mais encore pour les infractions appelées non intentionnelles comme par exemple les délits d'imprudence et la plupart des contraventions de police [3].

Sans doute on a prétendu, et même jugé, que les contraventions de police étaient des infractions purement matérielles qui se trouvaient réalisées du seul fait de l'accomplissement de l'acte prohibé par la loi ou le

254

1. Pour quelques auteurs, l'élément moral n'est pas un élément constitutif de l'infraction, mais une condition psychologique de la culpabilité de l'auteur d'une infraction, objectivement constituée (MERLE et VITU « Traité de droit criminel », 7e éd., n° 572 et ss. ; Comp. G. LEVASSEUR « Étude de l'élément moral de l'infraction », Annales de la Faculté de droit de Toulouse, t. XVIII, fac. 1, p. 81 et ss.). Pour d'autres, une fois l'imputabilité établie, il faut rechercher si la société reproche une « réaction hostile aux règles sociales », (A.C. DANA, Essai sur la notion d'infraction pénale, p. 343). Quelques auteurs estiment qu'il y a essentiellement l'acte et que les aspects psychologiques intéressent la responsabilité de l'agent (PRADEL, 12e éd., n° 493). A vrai dire, l'élément moral est bien un composante de l'infraction puisque, en son absence, le juge d'instruction est en droit de rendre une décision de non-lieu, et le juge de jugement une décision de relaxe ou d'acquittement.

2. Dans les comportements qui se poursuivent dans le temps, et constituent des infractions successives, la mala fides superviens pouvait rendre délictueux à partir d'un certain moment un comportement qui jusque-là était licite. Tel était le cas pour le recel, par exemple, lorsque le détenteur apprend l'origine de la chose (Crim. 22 juin 1972, Gaz. Pal., 1972.1.842 et la note, Bull. n° 220 ; Crim. 15 juin 1973, D. 1973, Inf. Rap., p. 158). Mais un revirement de jurisprudence s'est produit : Crim. 24 nov. 1977, D. 1978, J. p. 42, note KEHRIG « L'acquéreur d'un bien mobilier ne saurait être déclaré coupable de recel, lorsque la régularité de la possession et la bonne foi impliquent la réunion des conditions d'application de l'article 2279 C. civil », c'est-à-dire lorsqu'il est propriétaire de ce bien ; on ne peut être receleur de sa propre chose. V. aussi Crim. 24 janv. 1978, Bull. crim. n° 27 ; Crim. 3 déc. 1984, Bull. crim. n° 381.

3. Sur les adages concernant la nécessité d'une volonté coupable en droit romain et sous l'ancien droit, voir LAINGUI, Rev. sc. crim., 1986, p. 38 et ss.

3178

5805

règlement [1]. Mais la loi admet qu'une contravention puisse ne pas exister en cas de force majeure [2], et l'on reconnaît que les causes subjectives de non-culpabilité prévues par l'art. 122-1 à 122-3 C. Pén. font disparaître l'infraction, même en cas de simple contravention.

C'est dire que l'infraction, qu'il s'agisse d'un crime d'un délit ou d'une contravention, n'est constituée et donc punissable que si un auteur a eu la volonté ou la conscience de violer la loi pénale. Cette volonté ou conscience constitue l'élément commun à toutes les infractions. C'est donc à tort que l'on parle souvent « d'infraction involontaire ». L'expression « atteinte involontaire à la vie » par laquelle le Code pénal désigne l'homicide et les blessures par imprudence (art. 221-6 et 222-19) ne signifie nullement que ces délits ne sont pas l'œuvre d'une volonté (l'acte d'imprudence a été voulu) mais seulement que leurs conséquences n'ont pas été voulues.

Toujours nécessaire à l'existence de l'infraction — tous les actes délictueux sont volontaires — la volonté n'a cependant pas toujours le même rôle, ni la même étendue [3]. Tantôt elle ne porte que sur l'acte lui-même ; tantôt elle porte à la fois sur l'acte et sur ses conséquences. Lorsque l'auteur a voulu l'acte et ses conséquences et qu'il a accompli l'acte pour les produire, on dit qu'il y a intention criminelle ou dol pénal (meurtre, assassinat, vol, etc.). Quand l'auteur a voulu l'acte mais sans en vouloir les conséquences, qu'il aurait dû prévoir et pu éviter, on dit qu'il y a faute pénale (atteinte involontaire à la vie ou à l'intégrité physique, la plupart des contraventions).

254 Intention et faute ◇ Cette distinction de l'intention criminelle et de la faute n'est pas nettement posée dans notre législation. Les mots « intention » ou « dol » et « faute » étaient rarement employés par l'ancien Code pénal ou les lois postérieures. On trouvait plutôt les mots « préméditation, frauduleusement, sciemment, à dessein » ou même « volontairement ». Par ailleurs, le terme « faute »ne figurait guère dans les textes ; pour désigner la faute, le législateur parlait de « maladresse, d'imprudence ou de négligence » ou « de défaut d'adresse ou de précaution » (art. 320 C. pén). Quelquefois même, il passait complètement sous silence l'existence de l'intention ou de la faute, et c'est la jurisprudence qui indiquait si l'infraction nécessitait une faute prouvée [4] ou une faute

1. V. à propos de la contravention de dégradation de chemins publics (anc. art. R. 34-11°) : Crim. 7 mars 1918, S. 1921.I.89 note ROUX.

2. Crim. 15 mai 1926, S. 1928.I.33, note ROUX.

3. Sur l'élément moral en droit comparé, cf. BROSENS, « L'élément moral dans les infractions et le futur code pénal belge », Rev. dr. pén. crimin., 1980, p. 407.

4. Depuis la loi du 29 déc. 1977 (art. 2), la Cour de Cassation décide qu'en matière de fraudes fiscales (art. 1741 et 1743 C.G.I.), il incombe au Ministère public et à l'administration, parties poursuivantes, de rapporter la preuve du caractère intentionnel soit de la soustraction soit de la tentative de soustraction à l'établissement ou au paiement des impôts : Crim. 5 juin 1979, J.C.P., 1979.IV.263, Rev. soc., 1980, p. 1980, p. 106, note B. BOULOC ; Crim. 8 juin 1979, D. 1979, Inf. Rap., 527 ; Crim. 17 oct. 1983, Rev. soc., 1985, p. 149 note B. BOULOC ; Crim. 29 juin 1987, Bull.

3179

5806

présumée [1], ou bien si l'élément moral devait obligatoirement consister dans une intention criminelle.

Et cependant, en ce qui concerne l'élément moral, la distinction de l'intention et de la faute est si importante que plusieurs législations étrangères en ont fait la base de leur division des infractions. A la classification tripartite de notre droit, en crimes, délits et contraventions, fondée apparemment sur la peine mais en réalité sur la gravité objective de l'acte, elles ont substitué une classification bipartite, en délits (crimes et délits), c'est-à-dire infractions intentionnelles d'une part, et contraventions, c'est-à-dire infractions non intentionnelles d'autre part (C. pén. norvégien de 1902, C. pén. italien de 1930, C. espagnol de 1944). Satisfaisante pour l'esprit, cette division serait difficile à appliquer dans notre droit positif, où tous les délits ne sont pas intentionnels (il y a, en effet, des délits d'imprudence), et où il existe des contraventions intentionnelles telles le dommage volontairement causé à la propriété mobilière ou immobilière d'autrui et la contravention de coups et blessures volontaires. De plus, cette division bipartite bouleverserait notre organisation judiciaire répressive, et la compétence respective des cours d'assises (crimes), des tribunaux correctionnels (délits) et des tribunaux de police (contraventions). Le droit français qualifiait cependant différemment les mêmes agissements selon qu'ils ont eu lieu de façon intentionnelle (auquel cas il y a crime ou délit) ou non intentionnelle (auquel cas il y a simplement contravention [2]).

Les rédacteurs du nouveau Code pénal ont, ce point, adopté une règle plus claire. Selon l'art. 121-3, « il n'y a pas de crime ou de délit sans intention de le commettre ». Le principe est donc que les infractions graves (crimes ou délits) sont naturellement intentionnelles. Toutefois, ils ont prévu, lorsque la loi en disposerait ainsi, qu'il y aurait délit en cas de mise en danger délibérée de la personne d'autrui et également en cas d'imprudence ou de négligence. Ainsi, une faute peut suffire en matière de délits. Par ailleurs, l'art 339 de la loi d'adaptation 16 décembre 1992 a entendu régler la question pour les délits matériels résultant de textes antérieurs au nouveau Code pénal. Ceux-ci ne peuvent être constitués qu'en cas d'imprudence, de négligence ou de mise en danger délibérée de la personne d'autrui. Cette disposition impose donc la constatation d'une faute pour les délits non intentionnels régis par des lois spéciales [3]. Quant aux contraventions, elles n° 269. En matière de délit d'émission de chèques sans provision, la Cour de Cassation avait décidé, après la loi du 3 janvier 1975 et avant celle du 31 décembre 1991, que l'intention requise consiste dans la conscience de ce que le chèque sera impayé et dans la volonté de le laisser impayé (Crim. 3 avril 1979, Bull. crim. n° 133 ; Crim. 5 oct. 1983, D. 1984, p. 461). En matière de défense faite au tiré de payer (délit dit de blocage de la provision), l'intention de porter atteinte aux droits d'autrui n'existait pas s'il y avait contestation sur le montant de la créance : Crim. 13 avril 1983, Bull. crim. n° 102, D. 1984, p. 461 note B. BOULOC.

1. Elle faisait état, non plus d'infraction non intentionnelle, mais d'infraction matérielle, voir Crim. 28 avr. 1977, D. 1978, J. 149, note M.L. RASSAT, (pollution des cours d'eau).

2. V. par exemple en matière de fraude (L. 1er août 1905, art. 1 et ss. et 13 et ss. ; B. BOULOC, « La loi du 1er août 1905 en tant qu'instrument de la sécurité du consommateur » in ouvrage collectif sur la sécurité des consommateurs, L.G.D.J. 1987) ; ou de circulation routière (art. L. 10 et R. 241 code route : Crim. 28 févr. 1973, Bull. n° 101).

3. Certains auteurs ont prétendu que ce texte contredirait l'art. 121-3 C. Pén. et que la circulaire serait d'une obscure clarté (SOYER, droit pénal et proc. pénale, 14e éd., nos 202 à 205). A peuvent comporter un élément intentionnel, ou une faute, mais celle-ci ne peut pas être retenue en cas de force majeure.

3180

Il importe dès lors d'étudier, tout d'abord l'intention ou dol criminel (section 1) la faute pénale (section 2) et enfin la distinction des infractions intentionnelles et des infractions non intentionnelles (section 3).

SECTION 1. L'INTENTION OU DOL CRIMINEL

355 L'intention ou dol criminel constitue l'élément moral (sans doute est-il préférable de parler d'élément psychologique) dans les crimes, la plupart des délits [1] et exceptionnellement certaines contraventions [2]. Cette intention ne peut évidemment se concevoir que dans la mesure où la personne est dotée de conscience ; c'est pourquoi chez le dément, la question de l'existence de l'intention ne se pose même pas. En revanche, dans l'hypothèse de la contrainte, l'agent a conscience, et même a voulu l'acte, mais il n'était pas libre d'agir différemment, de sorte que sa responsabilité pénale sera écartée, bien que l'infraction ait été pleinement constituée.

la vérité, l'art. 339, d'origine législative est une mesure d'adaptation des solutions anciennes à la loi nouvelle, et signifie qu'une faute doit être établie pour qu'il soit possible de reconnaître la culpabilité de l'agent. Saisie de ce problème à propos d'infractions jugées avant le 1er mars 1994, la Cour de cassation a décidé que la constatation de la violation en connaissance de cause d'une prescription légale ou réglementaire impliquait l'intention coupable : Crim. 25 mai 1994, Bull. n° 203, Rev. sc. crim. 1995, p. 97, obs. BOULOC (vente sans facture) ; Crim. 12 juillet 1994, Bull. n° 280 (construction) ; Crim. 28 nov. 1994, Bull. n° 380 Rev. sc. crim. 1995, p. 570, obs. BOULOC (contributions indirectes) ; Crim. 14 déc. 1994, Bull. n° 415 (publicité trompeuse). V. aussi Crim. 25 oct. 1995, Bull. n° 322 ; Crim.26 oct. 1999, Bull. n° 233.

1. Bien que l'art. 121-3 C. Pén. exige en principe une intention, de nombreux textes croient nécessaire de faire état de la fraude ou de l'action volontaire (V. art. 311-1, 223-5, 313-4...). En matière de publicité trompeuse, depuis la loi du 27 décembre 1973, la mauvaise foi de l'agent n'est plus exigée : Crim. 8 mars 1978, J.C.P. 1979.II.19019 note FOURGOUX ; Crim. 4 déc. 1978, D. 1979, Inf. Rap., 186 note ROUJOU DE BOUBÉE ; Crim. 13 mars 1979, J.C.P., 1979.IV.179 ; Crim. 3 janvier 1984, Bull. n° 450 ; Crim. 5 avril 1995, Bull. n° 151.

2. Il faut tenir compte du fait que, même lorsqu'elle proclame que l'élément moral d'une infraction est un dol (intention criminelle), la jurisprudence se contente parfois, en pratique, d'un comportement qui ne dépasse guère la faute d'imprudence ; tel est le cas en matière de recel, de fraudes sur la qualité de la marchandise vendue, etc. La Cour de Cassation estime par ailleurs, que l'existence d'une intention coupable est implicitement contenue dans les constatations des juges du fait concernant l'élément matériel. Il en est ainsi depuis longtemps en matière de diffamation, de fraude dans les ventes (Crim. 21 juillet 1977, D. 1978, I.R. 111, note PUECH ; Crim. 11 oct. 1989, Bull. n° 355) ou le détournement dans le délit d'abus de confiance (Crim. 4 juill. 1972, Bull. n° 228 ; Crim. 5 avril 1973, Bull. n° 177, D. 1973, Inf. Rap., p. 113 ; Crim. 9 avr. 1973, Bull. n° 179, D. 1973, Inf. Rap., p. 133 ; Crim. 16 mars 1987, Bull. n° 122). En matière de pollution de cours d'eau, le prévenu ne peut être exonéré que par la force majeure (Crim. 28 avr. 1977, D. 1978, J. 149, note M.L. RASSAT, J.C.P. 1978.II.18931 note Mme DELMAS-MARTY). En matière de délits de société : V. Crim. 7 nov. 1983, Rev. soc., 1984, p. 327, note BOULOC ; mais voir : Crim. 17 oct. 1983, Bull. crim. n° 246 et surtout Crim. 19 déc. 1973, Rev. soc., 1974, p. 363, note BOULOC (abus de biens sociaux), et Crim. 1 mars 2000, Bull. n° 101 (nécessité de recherche l'interêt personnel du dirigeant).

§ 1. Définition et notion de l'intention criminelle

256 Au sens étymologique, l'intention (intendere) est la volonté tendue vers un certain but ; c'est une volonté dirigée. En droit pénal, l'intention criminelle qu'on appelle aussi le dol criminel est donc la volonté tendue à dessein vers un but interdit par la loi pénale (tuer ou s'approprier le bien d'autrui). Si le but recherché, quoique contraire en soi à l'ordre social, n'est pas défendu par un texte légal, la volonté de l'atteindre ne constitue pas une intention criminelle.

Partant de ce sens très général, deux notions très différentes de l'intention criminelle ont été dégagées : une notion classique et abstraite à laquelle s'oppose une notion positiviste et concrète.

A. La doctrine classique

257 D'après E. Garçon [1] et la plupart des criminalistes classiques, l'intention criminelle réside dans la connaissance ou la conscience chez l'agent qu'il accomplit un acte illicite [2]. D'une façon plus complète et plus précise (car pour qu'il y ait intention il ne suffit pas de connaître, il faut aussi vouloir), elle est la volonté d'accomplir un acte que l'on sait défendu par la loi pénale (homicide, vol, etc.) ou de s'abstenir d'un acte que l'on sait ordonné par la loi (omission volontaire de porter secours à une personne en péril, art. 223-6 C. Pén.).

Il est vrai qu'en raison de la règle nemo censetur ignorare legem et de la présomption de connaissance de la loi qu'elle fait peser sur chacun de nous, il n'est pas besoin, pour établir l'intention, de prouver que l'agent connaissait la loi pénale, mais seulement qu'il a eu la volonté de commettre l'acte défendu par la loi. La preuve de l'intention incombe normalement au ministère public [3]. Cependant la jurisprudence admet que, pour certaines infractions, l'existence de l'élément moral résulte de la seule constatation de l'élément matériel [4], ce qui n'est pas contraire à la présomption

258

1. Code pénal annoté, 1ère éd. art. I, n° 77.

2. Sur des espèces où la jurisprudence a admis l'absence d'intention, cf. Poitiers 7 févr. 1974, D. 1974.693, note PRADEL et ALAPHILIPPE (chantage du commerçant qui exige une somme très supérieure à la valeur de l'objet volé) ; Paris 22 juin 1974, Gaz. Pal., 1974.2. Somm. 290 (abandon de famille).

3. V. Procédure pénale, 17e éd., n° 129.

4. C'est le cas pour le délit d'excitation de mineurs à la débauche (art. 334-1, dernier alinéa C. Pén.), pour le délit de contrefaçon d'une œuvre littéraire ou artistique (art. 425 C. Pén., cf. Crim. 15 mai 1934, D. H. 1934, p. 350 ; Crim. 12 juin 1976, Bull. n° 209), pour le délit de contrefaçon de marque (Crim. 26 avril 2000, Bull. n° 166) et pour le délit de diffamation (Crim. 3 janv. 1970, D. 1970, somm. 68 « Les imputations diffamatoires sont réputées faites avec intention coupable et portent elles-mêmes l'intention de nuire » ; Crim. 12 juin 1987, B. n° 247 ; Crim. 14 avril 1992, B. n° 162 ; Crim. 29 nov. 1994, Bull. n° 382). Voir : A. TOULEMON, « L'intention coupable en matière de diffamation » J.C.P. 1970.I.1230 ; CONTE, Mélanges Chavanne p. 49. Il est possible néanmoins au prévenu de démontrer sa bonne foi, et par suite l'absence d'élément moral, mais la charge de la preuve lui en incombe et le doute ne suffit pas, contrairement d'innocence dès lors que l'intéressé a la possibilité de rapporter la preuve contraire [1].

5809

Dans cette conception, l'intention existe du moment que celui qui a accompli l'acte délictueux est une personne vivante, douée de raison et de volonté. Les animaux, les morts et les déments ne peuvent avoir une intention criminelle et par suite ne peuvent tomber sous le coup de la loi pénale. En revanche, dès que la volonté d'accomplir un acte illicite existe, l'infraction intentionnelle se trouve réalisée [2] et la peine doit frapper sans distinction et sans merci, celui qui a commis cet acte, quelles que soient les raisons (mobiles ou motifs) pour lesquelles il l'a voulu [3]. Il importe peu qu'il ait agi par haine, par cupidité, par convoitise, par passion amoureuse ou politique, par fanatisme, par pitié ou sous l'influence de la misère ou de la nécessité. C'est cette conception qu'adopte la Cour de cassation depuis la mise en vigueur du nouveau Code pénal, notamment en ce qui concerne les délits matériels [4].

B. La conception réaliste

218 A cette notion classique s'oppose la notion réaliste de l'intention qui a été dégagée par les positivistes, en particulier par Enrico FERRI [5]. Pour ceux-ci, l'intention n'est pas une volonté abstraite, mais une volonté déterminée par un motif ou un mobile. Il faut donc analyser le mobile, rechercher s'il est social ou antisocial ; un fait n'est punissable que s'il a été voulu dans un but contraire à l'ordre social (cf. art. 63 du C. pén. suisse de 1937 ; art. 133 du C. pén. italien de 1930).

Entre la conception classique et la conception réaliste, le droit pénal français a choisi la conception classique : l'intention est tout à fait distincte des mobiles. Aussi, est punissable celui qui a recours à des moyens frauduleux pour tenter de rentrer en possession d'un bien lui appartenant, ou celui au droit commun (Crim. 16 mai 1973, Bull. n° 225, D. 1973, Inf. Rap., p. 136). La Cour de Cassation a de même répété fréquement qu'en matière d'abus de confiance, la mauvaise foi peut résulter nécessairement de la constatation du détournement (Crim. 5 nov. 1975, Bull. n° 237 ; Crim. 17 mai 1976, Bull. n° 159, D. 1976, Inf. Rap., p. 177 ; Crim. 12 févr. 1979, D. 1979, Inf. Rap., p. 482 ; Crim. 16 mars 1987, Bull. n° 122 ; Crim. 3 juillet 1997, Bull. n° 265). A propos du délit de pollution des cours d'eau, elle a jugé que « le fait d'avoir laissé s'écouler dans une rivière des substances toxiques implique une faute dont la preuve n'a pas à être spécialement rapportée par le ministère public et dont le prévenu ne peut être exonéré que par la force majeure » (Crim. 28 avr. 1977, Bull. n° 148, D. 1978.149, note critique M.L. RASSAT). Le droit anglo-américain connaît une solution assez voisine avec l'application de l'adage « res ipsa loquitur ».

1. V. Crim. 17 déc. 1991, B. n° 481, Rev. sc. crim., 1993, p. 89 obs. BOULOC ; Crim. 1 février 2000, Bull. n° 51.

2. V. en matière de fraude fiscale : Crim. 11 janvier 1996, Bull. n° 19.

3. En matière de mise en danger délibérée, l'intention résulte du caractère délibéré de la violation d'une obligation particulière de prudence ou de sécurité : Crim. 9 mars 1999, Bull. n° 34.

4. V. en matière de construction sans permis : Crim. 25 mai 1994, Bull. n° 203 ; Crim. 12 juillet 1994, Bull. n° 280 ; Crim. 10 janv. 1996, Bull. n° 13. En matière de publicité illicite pour le tabac : Crim. 30 oct. 1995, Bull. n° 335.

5. Sociologie criminelle, p. 628 et ss. ; Crim. 10 mai 1976, Bull. n° 149, D. 1976, Inf. Rap., 169.

3183

qui cherche à empêcher la réalisation d'interruptions volontaires de grossesse en usant de menaces à l'encontre du personnel médical (art. L. 162-15 C. santé publique).

§ 2. Intention et mobile

259 Dans la conception positiviste, l'intention criminelle se confond avec le motif ou tout au moins est conditionnée par lui. D'après la conception classique, au contraire, qui ne voit dans l'intention criminelle qu'une volonté abstraite, l'intention et le mobile sont nettement distincts. Alors que l'intention, qui n'est autre que la volonté consciente d'accomplir un acte illicite est toujours la même, le mobile, c'est-à-dire l'intérêt ou le sentiment qui a déterminé l'action, ou encore « la cause impulsive et déterminante de l'acte criminel » est, par contre, essentiellement variable avec les individus et les circonstances.

Fidèle à cette conception classique, le Code pénal français ne considère que l'intention ; il ne tient aucun compte du mobile [1]. En règle générale, celui-ci est indifférent tant en ce qui concerne l'existence de l'infraction que la répression de celle-ci.

A. Le mobile et l'existence de l'infraction

260 Le principe : le mobile est indifférent ◇ En principe, l'infraction intentionnelle est constituée, dès l'instant qu'il y a intention criminelle, quel que soit le mobile de cette infraction [2]. Dans certains cas cependant, la considération du motif peut faire considérer comme licite un acte qui par ses éléments extérieurs participe à la nature d'un délit et inversement faire considérer illicite, un acte, qui sans le mobile qui l'a inspiré, ne le serait pas.

C'est ainsi, prétend-on, qu'il n'y a pas infraction, bien qu'il y ait intention, lorsque l'acte délictueux a été commis en état de légitime défense (art. 122-5 C. Pén.) ou sur

1. Voir : Angers 30 janv. 1969, Gaz. Pal., 1969.I.291 ; Crim. 18 juill. 1973, Gaz. Pal., 1973.2.709, note J.P.D. ; Crim. 13 mars 1974, Bull. n° 107, Gaz. Pal., 1974.I.421 ; Crim. 24 févr. 1976, Bull. n° 69, D. 1976, Inf. Rap., p. 126 (violences volontaires et dégradation de véhicules). Cf. MIMIN, « L'intention et le mobile », Mélange Patin, p. 113.

2. Crim. 21 oct. 1969, Bull. n° 258 ; Crim. 18 juill. 1975, Gaz. Pal., 1975.II.661 ; Crim. 8 févr. 1977, Bull. n° 52, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1977, p. 590, n° 3 : la destruction de fleurs sur une tombe constitue le délit de vol « quels qu'en soient les mobiles » ; Crim. 8 déc. 1998, Bull. n° 336 ; Crim. 19 mai 1983, Bull. crim. n° 150, Rev. sc. crim., 1984, p. 736, obs. LARGUIER : les juges ne peuvent se déterminer par des considérations étrangères au principe de la légalité des délits et des peines et tirées de l'allégation d'un mobile subjectif ; en l'espèce, la raison d'ordre idéologique invoquée par un maître-assistant des facultés de droit pour écarter un délit de fraude fiscale, n'a pas été retenue ; Crim. 7 juin 1988, Bull. n° 289 arrêt n° 1, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1989.107 (plaisanterie) ; Crim. 8 janvier 1992, Bull. n° 5 (vente de bois par des ouvriers forestiers pour se payer des salaires non perçus par la suite d'une grève) ; Crim. 21 oct. 1998, Bull. n° 273 (refus de vente de produits contraceptifs en raison de convictions personnelles, et non d'une indisponibilité matérielle des produits).

l'ordre de la loi et le commandement de l'autorité légitime (art. 122-4 C. Pén.) ou en état de nécessité parce qu'en ce cas le mobile de l'agent n'est pas antisocial. Il nous paraît plus exact de dire que dans tous ces cas l'acte se trouve justifié par la loi et qu'il ne constitue plus une infraction en raison de la disparition de l'élément légal [1].

S'il est douteux que le mobile à lui seul fasse disparaître l'infraction, il est, en tout cas, certain qu'il est parfois un élément constitutif de l'infraction.

L'exception : la prise en considération du mobile ◇ L'intention criminelle, considérée comme une volonté abstraite, ne suffit plus alors à constituer l'infraction ; celle-ci n'existe qu'en raison du mobile qui l'a inspirée. Ainsi, la loi du 28 juillet 1894 ne réprimait les menées anarchistes que si elles avaient été faites « dans un but de propagande anarchiste» (art. 1 et 2). En cas d'atteinte au crédit de l'État, la loi du 12 février 1924 ne frappait que ceux qui avaient agi « dans un but de spéculation ou de dépréciation de la monnaie ».

La considération du but pour l'incrimination apparaît aussi dans certaines atteintes aux intérêts fondamentaux de la Nation. Il est aussi présent dans les actes de terrorisme (art. 421-1 C. Pén.).

La diffamation de certains groupes sociaux n'était réprimée avant la loi du 1er juillet 1972, que si elle avait pour but d'exciter à la haine entre les citoyens (loi 29 juill. 1881, art. 32 modifié par décret-loi 21 avril 1939). De même, l'infraction prévue par l'article 434-25 C. Pén. n'est réalisée que si l'auteur commentant la décision judiciaire a cherché à porter atteinte à l'autorité de la Justice [2]. La provocation à l'abandon d'un enfant né ou à naître, comme l'entremise apportée pour faire recueillir ou adopter un enfant, ne sont punissables que si l'agent a agi « dans un esprit de lucre » (art. 227-12 C. pén.). La banqueroute n'est punissable, dans certains cas, que si l'agent a fait des achats en vue d'une revente au-dessous du cours ou a employé des moyens ruineux pour se procurer des fonds, et ce dans l'intention d'éviter ou de retarder l'ouverture de la procédure de redressement judiciaire (art. 197-1, loi du 25 janv. 1985).

Enfin, le délit d'organisation de sa propre insolvabilité, institué par l'art. 1er de la loi du 8 juill. 1983 (art. 314-7 C. Pén.) requiert de l'agent qu'il ait eu en vue de se soustraire à l'exécution d'une condamnation pécuniaire prononcée par une juridiction répressive ou, en matière délictuelle, quasi-délictuelle ou d'aliments, par une juridiction civile.

Ce ne sont là que des cas exceptionnels. En principe, le mobile n'intervient pas dans la constitution du délit ; celui-ci est réalisé par la seule volonté criminelle, abstraction faite du mobile qui l'a déterminée.

1. Crim. 24 févr. 1976, Inf. Rap., 126 et 127, relatif à un délit de dégradation volontaire de véhicules ; Crim. 15 mars 1977, Bull. n° 94, D. 1977, Inf. Rap., 28, concernant le délit de coups et blessures volontaires. Ces délits sont constitués dès lors qu'il existe un acte volontaire, quel que soit le mobile qui les ait inspirés, et alors même que leur auteur n'aurait pas voulu le dommage qui en est résulté. Il en est de même, nous semble-t-il, dans le cas de justification prévu par l'ordonnance du 6 juillet 1943, dont l'article 1 a déclaré légitimes « tous les actes accomplis postérieurement au 10 juin 1940, dans le but de servir la cause de la libération de la France », quand bien même ils auraient constitué des infractions au regard de la législation appliquée à l'époque.

2. Crim. 27 févr. 1964, D. 1964.623.

Sans influence sur l'existence ni la qualification de l'infraction, le mobile n'influe pas davantage sur la peine ; il peut, au contraire, jouer un rôle sur le terrain de la compétence et de la procédure.

B. Le mobile et la répression de l'infraction

262 Sans doute, l'article 224-4 du nouveau Code pénal, punit de la peine de la réclusion criminelle de 30 ans, non seulement l'enlèvement d'une personne comme otage, mais encore l'enlèvement accompli en vue de se faire payer une rançon, ou d'obtenir l'exécution d'un ordre ou d'une condition. Mais, en règle générale, la loi ne tient pas compte des motifs. Elle prévoit toujours la même peine, quel qu'ait été le mobile de l'acte. L'assassin, qu'il ait tué par vengeance, par haine, par pitié (euthanasie) ou par amour (crime passionnel) est punissable de la réclusion criminelle à perpétuité (art. 221-3 C. Pén.). De même qu'il ait volé par cupidité, par convoitise, par habitude, par manie (kleptomane) ou par misère, l'auteur d'un vol simple est toujours exposé à la peine de prison édictée par l'article 311-3 C. Pén.

263 Toutefois si, en droit, le mobile n'a aucun effet sur la peine, en fait il en est autrement. En vue de corriger la rigueur excessive et automatique de la loi, le juge tient souvent compte des mobiles dans l'application judiciaire de la peine. Les cours d'assises acquittent fréquemment, trop souvent peut-être, les criminels passionnels. Quand le mobile ne lui paraît pas répréhensible, le juge répressif n'hésite pas à acquitter, en déclarant que le prévenu n'est pas coupable et qu'il a agi sans intention délictueuse, ce qui suppose une confusion regrettable entre l'intention et le mobile. Et même, lorsqu'il condamne, en considération du motif qui a inspiré l'auteur, il condamne celui-ci à une peine inférieure au maximum légal, car la loi lui permet de tenir compte des circonstances de l'infraction et de la personnalité de son auteur (art. 132-24 C. Pén.) [1].

Or plutôt que d'acquitter ou de condamner à une peine moins sévère, ne conviendrait-il pas, dans un but de défense sociale, puisque aussi bien un acte antisocial a été commis, d'en punir toujours l'auteur, mais de lui appliquer une sanction d'un caractère différent (déshonorant ou non) suivant le motif qui l'a fait agir ? C'est le système des peines parallèles, en vertu duquel le juge, en tenant compte du mobile, peut prononcer soit une peine humiliante et infamante (la réclusion), soit une peine « honorable » (la détention). Sous l'influence de la doctrine néo-classique, le Code pénal italien de 1889 l'avait admis pour certaines infractions (avortement, infanticide, abandon d'enfant nouveau-né) accomplies pour un « mobile d'honneur » ; le Code pénal italien de 1930 n'a pas reproduit ce parallélisme des peines, qui a trouvé son application la plus large dans le Code pénal norvégien de 1902 (art. 24) et l'ancien code pénal de Cuba de 1936 (art. 55).

Il existe bien en droit français une double échelle de peines : peines de droit commun et peines politiques, mais cette double échelle n'existe que pour les crimes, et par ailleurs le critère de la distinction des infractions de droit commun et des infractions politiques repose plutôt sur la nature objective de l'acte que sur la considération du mobile politique de l'auteur [1]. Ce n'est donc pas le système des peines parallèles ; et c'est regrettable, car si, quel qu'ait été le motif qui ait poussé à commettre un acte délictueux, une sanction s'impose, en cas de motif honorable cette sanction pourrait ne pas être infâmante.

1. Par exemple pour une modération de la peine : Crim. 25 mars 1998, Dr. pén. 1998 n° 112 obs. VERON.

C. Le mobile et la procédure

264 Le mobile est pris en considération par la jurisprudence pour décider que deux infractions sont unies par un lien d'indivisibilité. Il en est ainsi lorsque les différents faits ont été « commis dans le même trait de temps, dans le même lieu et ayant été déterminés par le même mobile ». En pareil cas, cette indivisibilité agit d'ailleurs non seulement sur la compétence, mais même sur le caractère intentionnel ou non des divers agissements reprochés [2].

Par ailleurs, depuis la loi du 9 septembre 1986, le droit pénal prend en compte le mobile pour soumettre les infractions de terrorisme à certaines règles dérogatoires de procédure pénale, et en particuler à la compétence de la Cour d'assises sans jurés (V. art. 421-1 C. Pén. et art. 706-16 et ss. C.P.P.). Il s'agit, rappelons-le, d'actes « en relation avec une entreprise individuelle ou collective ayant pour but de troubler gravement l'ordre public par l'intimidation ou la terreur ».

§ 3. Les modalités et les degrés de l'intention criminelle

265 Bien qu'elle soit une volonté abstraite indépendante des motifs qui l'ont déterminée, l'intention criminelle n'est pas cependant uniforme ; elle peut comporter des modalités différentes et des degrés divers [3]. Le droit pénal classique distingue, en effet, le dol général et le dol spécial, le dol simple et le dol aggravé, le dol déterminé et le dol indéterminé, et enfin le dol direct et le dol éventuel.

1. Voir supra, n° 190 ; Comp. Crim. 28 sept. 1970. D. 1971, p. 36, note F. CHABAS, qui a assimilé à une infraction politique en ce qui concerne la contrainte par corps, le délit de dégradation d'un monument d'utilité publique par une inscription d'un libellé objectivement politique. Et même, pendant quelques années, en vertu d'un décret du 16 septembre 1971 (art. D. 496. C.P.P., qui a été abrogé par un décret du 23 octobre 1975), ont pu bénéficier d'un régime spécial de détention, les personnes qui, lorsqu'elles ont commis leur infraction, étaient animées par des mobiles présentant un caractère politique.

2. Crim. 28 juill. 1969, Gaz. Pal., 1969.2.364, note J.P. DOUCET, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1970, p. 96.

3. Cf. BERNARDINI, « L'intention coupable en droit pénal », thèse Nice, 1976, 2 vol. (ronéo) ; A. HAUTEVILLE, « La gradation des fautes pénales », in Réflexions sur le nouveau Code pénal, Pédone 1995, p. 31.

A. Dol général et dol spécial

266 Le dol général consiste selon E. Garçon [1] dans la volonté d'accomplir un acte que l'on sait défendu par la loi [2] et il n'est pas toujours suffisant. Quelquefois, la loi subordonne l'existence de l'infraction à une volonté criminelle plus précise qu'on appelle le dol spécial ou dol spécifique [3]. C'est ainsi qu'en plus de la volonté consciente de violer la loi pénale, elle exige, en outre, soit l'intention de donner la mort (art. 221-1 N. C. pén.) [4], soit la volonté de s'approprier la chose d'autrui (en cas de vol par exemple, art. 311-1 C. Pén.), soit la volonté de causer un préjudice individuel ou social (en cas de faux documentaire, art. 441-1 C. Pén.). En cas de diffamation, la volonté de nuire à l'honneur ou à la considération d'une personne (art. 29 loi du 29 juillet 1881) [5] est exigée, tandis qu'en matière de chèque émis au mépris d'une interdiction, la loi impose que l'agent ait eu l'intention de porter atteinte aux droits d'autrui [6].

B. Dol simple et dol aggravé

267 Le dol est par ailleurs susceptible de degrés, dont la considération peut influer sur la qualification et la répression [7].

A cet égard, au dol simple qui entraîne la peine ordinaire, on oppose le dol aggravé ou préméditation [8], qui entraine une peine plus sévère, en cas d'homicide et de coups et blessures (art. 221-3, 222-12, 222-13 C. Pén.). Ainsi, le meurtre avec préméditation constitue un assassinat, punissable de la réclusion criminelle à perpétuité, au lieu de la réclusion criminelle de trente ans.

1. Voir supra, n° 257.

2. L'existence même du dol général est contestée par A.C. DANA, au moins sur le plan conceptuel. A ses yeux la volonté de l'agent est absorbée par l'imputabilité et la conscience de l'illicéité par la légalité pénale.

3. Pour A.C. DANA, le dol spécial consiste dans la volonté utilisée dans le but de nuire à une valeur sociale déterminée ; le comportement de l'agent est une réaction d'hostilité, et non de simple indifférence.

4. Crim. 9 janv. 1990, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1990, p. 337 ; Crim. 23 janvier 1990, Dr. pén. juillet 1990, n° 215 obs. VÉRON ; obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1990, p. 784 ; Crim. 13 novembre 1990, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1991, p. 345.

5. V. Crim. 23 mars 1978, J.C.P. 1978.IV.168 ; Crim. 15 oct. et 19 nov. 1985, Bull. crim. n^{os} 315 et 363 ; Crim. 28 février 1989, Bull. n° 98 ; Crim. 29 nov. 1994, Bull. n° 382.

6. V. Crim. 13 avril1983 et 5 oct. 1983, D. 1984, p. 461 note BOULOC ; Crim. 21 oct. 1985, D. 1986, Inf. Rap., 406 obs. ROUJOU DE BOUBÉE ; Crim. 22 mai 1989, Bull. n° 210. V. aussi Crim. 4 janvier 1996, Bull. n° 3.

7. L'ancien Code pénal faisait de la provocation en matière d'atteintes à l'intégrité physique, une cause d'atténuation de la peine, sans doute parce que la volonté de l'agent avait été influencée. Le nouveau Code pénal n'a pas retenu cette excuse, qui est mentionnée cependant à l'art. R. 621-2 (injure non publique).

8. Le guet-apens comporte nécessairement un dessein formé à l'avance et par conséquent la préméditation : Crim. 22 févr. 1989, Bull. n° 89, comp. obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1989, p. 737. Le nouveau Code pénal ne fait plus état du guet-apens.

La préméditation qui consiste dans le dessein formé avant l'action de commettre un crime (ou un délit) déterminé constitue une circonstance aggravante de l'homicide volontaire [1]. Aussi bien, cette circonstance aggravante doit faire l'objet d'une question posée à la Cour d'Assises [2]. Bien qu'elle puisse n'exister que chez l'auteur lui-même, la jurisprudence a souvent considéré qu'elle constituait une circonstance aggravant la criminalité de l'acte, et l'appliquait au complice de l'assassin [3].

C. Dol déterminé et dol indéterminé

168 Si l'on envisage la volonté non plus dans ses degrés et son intensité, mais dans ses résultats, on est amené à distinguer le dol déterminé et le dol indéterminé.

Le dol est déterminé lorsque l'agent a voulu d'une façon précise commettre tel crime ou tel délit (tuer ou voler) et à l'encontre de telle personne déterminée. Il l'est également quand l'agent a voulu le résultat, mais n'a pas connu l'identité de la victime, car la détermination du dol dépend d'abord de l'étendue de la volonté par rapport au résultat de l'infraction. En revanche, il est indéterminé lorsque l'agent n'a pas voulu l'acte délictueux d'une façon précise en ce qui concerne soit la gravité du résultat, soit l'identité de la victime [4].

Ainsi, celui qui volontairement donne des coups peut provoquer chez la victime une douleur passagère, des ecchymoses, une incapacité temporaire, une incapacité permanente (perte d'un œil, de l'usage d'un membre), soit même la mort. L'auteur de ces coups va-t-il être puni d'après la gravité du résultat produit, mais qu'il n'a pas précisément voulu (dolus indeterminatus determinatur eventu) ? C'est la solution consacrée pour les coups et blessures volontaires par les art. 222-7, 222-9, 222-11 et R. 625-1 C. Pén., et pour l'incendie volontaire par les art. 322-9 et 322-10 C. Pén. En général, la peine est proportionnée à la gravité du dommage éprouvé par la victime.

De même, lorsque l'indétermination porte sur l'identité de la victime, la loi considère que l'agent avait l'intention de créer un danger pour les personnes qui en seront les victimes (art. 322-6 C. Pén.) ; elle assimile

1. Voir infra, n° 343. Aussi, doit-elle faire l'objet d'une question distincte dans une accusation pour homicide volontaire : Crim. 19 oct. 1977, D. 1978, Inf. Rap., 52 ; Crim. 15 déc. 1982, Bull. n° 294.

2. V. en ce qui concerne la circonstance aggravante de préméditation : Crim. 4 janv. 1978. J.C.P. 1978.IV.77 ; Crim. 2 avr. 1979, D. 1979, Inf. Rap., 548.

3. Crim. 5 juin 1956, D. 1956.576 ; Crim. 27 déc. 1960, B. n° 621 ; Crim. 12 mai 1970, D. 1970.515, qui ont étendu au complice la circonstance aggravante de la préméditation. V. infra, n° 343.

4. Sur l'indétermination de la victime, en cas de piège à feu, voir : Crim. 17 mai 1977, J.C.P. 1978.II.18869, note BOUZAT ; Troyes, 24 mai 1978, J.C.P., 1979.II.19046, note BOUZAT ; Reims, 8 nov. 1978, D. 1979.92, note PRADEL, J.C.P., 1979.II.19046, note BOUZAT.

encore le dol indéterminé au dol déterminé, car il y a eu volonté de produire les résultats nuisibles [1].

269 Dol éventuel [2] ◇ Mais, lorsque l'agent, sans vouloir en aucune façon le résultat dommageable qui s'est produit, ou même aucun résultat, l'a simplement prévu comme possible, on parle alors de dol éventuel. C'est le cas du directeur d'une compagnie de transport aérien qui fait partir un avion qu'il sait ne pas être en parfait état de navigabilité. Si des passagers sont tués au cours de ce transport, peut-on dire qu'il soit coupable d'un homicide volontaire ? C'est également le cas de l'automobiliste imprudent qui double d'autres voitures au sommet d'une côte et provoque la mort d'un automobiliste venant en sens inverse. Peut-il être poursuivi comme auteur d'un homicide volontaire ? Le résultat délictueux n'est-il pas plutôt la conséquence d'une faute d'imprudence ?

Du point de vue psychologique, le dol éventuel se situe entre l'intention proprement dite et la faute d'imprudence ou de négligence, qui ne suppose ni l'acceptation éventuelle du résultat illicite, ni la recherche d'un tel résultat. Aussi, la plupart des auteurs et même la jurisprudence [3] considèrent-ils le dol éventuel comme une simple faute. Si probable qu'ait été le résultat, le fait d'avoir agi sans l'avoir voulu, constitue une faute d'imprudence, fût-elle lourde, mais en tout cas non intentionnelle [4], car pour qu'il y ait intention, il faut qu'il y ait eu prévision et acceptation au moins éventuelle du résultat [5].

Toutefois, la solution contraire, qui assimile le dol éventuel au dol direct et le punit comme une intention criminelle, a trouvé son application légale dans le cas où un incendie volontairement provoqué a entraîné accidentellement la mort ou les blessures d'une ou plusieurs personnes (art. 322-10 C.P.). D'après ce texte, l'auteur de cet incendie est punissable de réclusion criminelle à perpétuité, comme s'il avait eu l'intention de tuer les victimes accidentelles [6]. De même, aux termes de l'article 222-14 du nouveau Code pénal, les auteurs de violences habituelles sur des enfants de moins de 15 ans, sont punissables de trente ans de réclusion criminelle, — dès lors que ces mauvais traitements ont entraîné la mort — même si les blessures, les coups ou la privation d'aliments n'ont pas été accomplis dans l'intention de la donner.

1. Crim. 4 mai 1984, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1984, p. 737 ; Crim. 21 oct. 1998, Bull. n° 269.

2. DUVAL, « Le dol éventuel » thèse Paris 1900 ; JIMENEZ DE ASUA, « La faute consciente et le dolus eventualls », Rev. crim., 1959-1960, p. 603 ; J. CÉDRAS « Le dol éventuel : aux limites de l'intention », D. 1995, ch. 18.

3. Crim. 27 mars 1902, Bull. n° 128.

4. On rappellera que le nouveau Code pénal inclut dans les délits non intentionnels, les cas d'imprudence ou de négligence mais aussi « la mise en danger délibérée de la personne d'autrui » dont la sanction est plus forte que celle de la simple imprudence.

5. Sur le dol éventuel en droit belge, cf. J. VERHAEGEN, Liber Amicorum H. BEKAERT, p. 437.

6. Crim. 2 juillet 1986, Bull. crim., n° 229, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1987, p. 202.

70 La mise en danger délibérée ◇ Les rédacteurs du nouveau Code péna ont entendu aussi prendre en compte le dol éventuel lorsqu'ils ont retenu comme élément moral « la mise en danger délibérée de la personn d'autrui » (art. 121-3, al. 2 C. Pén.) [1]. Ainsi, en cas de manquement déli béré à une obligation de sécurité ou de prudence, l'homicide involontaire es puni plus sévèrement (art. 221-6 C. Pén.), comme d'ailleurs les blessure involontaires (art. 222-19, al. 2 C. Pén.). De même, il existe quelques incri minations de mises en danger de la personne (art. 223-1 et ss. C. Pén.) Dans ces différentes situations, la loi n'a pas assimilé le dol éventuel au do direct, mais elle a considéré qu'il s'agissait d'une faute aggravée se rappro chant de l'intention. On pouvait craindre que cet échelon intermédiaire n soit source d'arbitraire [2].

Mais la Cour de cassation a veillé à ce qu'une obligation particulière d sécurité et de prudence préexiste [3], ce qui est souvent le cas en matière d circulation routière [4], ou de navigation maritime [5]. De plus, elle a jugé que l faute constitutive de la mise en danger est caractérisée par la violatio manifestement délibérée de l'obligation imposée par la loi ou le réglemen sans que l'agent ait eu connaissance du risque particulier causé par so manquement [6].

71 Le résultat excédant les prévisions de l'agent ◇ Du dol éventuel, o rapproche généralement l'infraction praeterintentionnelle dans laquelle l résultat produit dépasse le but que se proposait l'agent, et est beaucoup plu grave qu'il ne l'avait voulu. Il en est ainsi lorsque, par exemple, celui qui ava simplement l'intention de blesser a tué. Faut-il punir l'auteur de ces coup mortels par leur résultat, comme s'il avait eu l'intention de tuer, comme u meurtrier ? Ou bien, puisqu'il n'a eu que l'intention de blesser, comm l'auteur d'un homicide par imprudence ?

Dans le délit praeterintentionnel, comme dans le dol éventuel, le résulta tel qu'il s'est réalisé, n'a pas été voulu ; dans les deux cas, l'intention n'a p

1. V. ACCOMANDO et GUÉRY, « Le délit de risque causé à autrui ou de la malencontre l'art. 223-1 N.C. Pén. », Rev. sc. crim. 1994, p. 68 ; M. PUECH « De la mise en danger d'autrui », . 1994, chr. 153 ; V. aussi A. d'HAUTEVILLE, « La gradation des fautes » in Réflexions sur le nouve Code pénal, Pédone 1995, p. 40 et ss.

2. V. pour une vitesse de 200 km/h sur autoroute : Douai 26 oct. 1994, D. 1995, p. 174 nc COUVRAT et MASSÉ (pas de mise en danger) ; TGI Saint-Etienne 4 et 10 août 1994, Gaz. P. 1994.II.773 et 775 ; Paris, 9 nov. 1995, Dr. pén. 1996, n° 57. obs. VÉRON ; Paris, 27 oct. 1995, D pén. 1996, n° 5 D. 1996 p. 445 note COCHE (vitesse excessive).

3. Crim. 25 juin 1996, Bull. n° 274, Rev. sc. crim. 1997, p. 106 obs. Y. MAYAUD et p. 390 ol J.H. ROBERT.

4. Crim. 12 mars 1997, Bull. n° 102 ; Crim. 12 nov. 1997, Bull. n° 384 ; Crim. 11 mars 195 Bull. n° 99 ; J.C.P. 1998.II.10064, note HOYEZ.

5. Crim. 11 févr. 1998, Bull. n° 55, J.C.P. 1998.II.10084 note J.Y. COCHE, Rev. sc. crim. 19 p. 545 obs MAYAUD rejetant le pourvoi c/ Rennes 26 sept. 1996, J.C.P. 1997.II.22902 note J CHEVALLIER.

6. Crim. 16 fév. 1999, Bull. n° 24 ; Crim. 9 mars 1999, Bull. n° 34 (pratique du ski sur u piste interdite).

5818

porte sur le résultat effectivement produit. Mais — et c'est là la différence — rien dit que dans le dol éventuel, le résultat qui n'a pas été prévu ou l'a été simplement comme possible, n'a été voulu ni sous la forme dans laquelle il s'est réalisé, ni sous une forme moins grave, dans le délit praeterintentionnel, au contraire, le résultat a été partiellement voulu. Par là, le délit praeterintentionnel se rapproche du délit intentionnel, où le résultat qui s'est produit a été voulu ; il s'en distingue cependant en ce que l'intention n'a porté que sur un résultat moins grave que le résultat réalisé. C'est pour cette raison que le Code pénal (art. 222-7), édicte seulement la peine de la réclusion criminelle à temps de quinze ans, et non pas la peine de la réclusion criminelle de trente ans (applicable au meurtrier volontaire) contre l'auteur de coups et blessures volontaires ayant entraîné la mort sans intention de la donner.

En réalité, le dol éventuel, la mise en danger délibérée et l'infraction praeterintentionnelle constituent une catégorie intermédiaire entre l'intention criminelle et la faute. Avec eux, on se trouve aux limites de l'intention, et très proche de la simple faute pénale.

SECTION 2. LA FAUTE PÉNALE

272 Dans toutes les infractions, même dans les infractions non intentionnelles (délits d'imprudence, ou involontaires [1], délits punissables malgré la bonne foi de leur auteur [2], la plupart des contraventions de police [3]) qui ne supposent pas une intention criminelle, il existe un élément moral. Cet élément consiste dans une simple faute : la faute pénale. Mais celle-ci n'a pas la même nature, ni les mêmes caractères suivant qu'il s'agit d'un délit d'imprudence ou d'une contravention [4].

§ 1. La nécessité d'une faute dans les infractions non intentionnelles

273 L'existence d'une faute, qui n'a jamais été contestée pour les délits d'imprudence, l'a été en revanche pour quelques délits correctionnels et la plupart des contraventions qui n'exigent pas une intention coupable et sont punis-

1. Ces mots homicides et blessures par imprudence (art. 221-6, 222-19 et R. 625-1 C. Pén.)
2. Par exemple : délits en matière de chasse ou de pêche.
3. A l'exception de celles pour lesquelles la loi exige un élément moral analogue au dol général ou spécial, comme par exemple l'art. R. 624-1, R. 625-1, R. 635-1 C. Pén. (coups et blessures volontaires, détérioration volontaire du bien d'autrui).
4. Pour A.C. Dana il s'agit cependant dans les deux cas d'une réaction d'indifférence du délinquant à l'égard des valeurs sociales, ce qu'il appelle la « faute normative ». Celle-ci implique la culpabilité sans recherche sur la psychologie de l'agent. La faute serait tout fait de l'homme défaillant par rapport à une norme de conduite (op. cit. p. 242). On remarquera que cette conception donne plus d'importance à la recherche au lien de causalité avec le dommage subi par la victime.

3192

sables du fait même de leur commission. On a prétendu, l'on a même jugé [1] que ces infractions purement matérielles se trouvaient réalisées par le seul fait de leur commission, indépendamment de la volonté de leur auteur. En d'autres termes, à la différence des crimes et de la grande majorité des délits qui supposent trois éléments, les contraventions et les délits contraventionnels ne comporteraient que l'élément légal et l'élément matériel ; l'élément moral en serait exclu. A suivre cette opinion, l'auteur d'une contravention ou d'un délit contraventionnel, du moment qu'il a commis l'acte matériel, devrait toujours être puni non seulement lorsqu'il a été de bonne foi, mais même s'il a agi sous l'empire de la démence ou de la force majeure. Telle n'est pas la position de notre droit, qui a tenu, avec le nouveau Code pénal à affirmer le principe même de la responsabilité de son propre fait (art. 121-1), et à soumettre les « délits matériels » à la constatation d'une faute (art. 339 loi du 16 déc. 1992) [2].

274 La jurisprudence décide qu'en cas de force majeure la contravention n'est pas punissable [3], solution qui se trouve confirmée par l'art. 121-3, al. 5 C. Pén. Par ailleurs, de nombreux criminalistes admettent que les faits justificatifs (légitime défense, ordre de la loi, état de nécessité) et les causes de non-imputabilité (démence et contrainte) qui suppriment la faute pénale, font en même temps disparaître la contravention. Sans faute, pas d'infraction (Nulla poena sine culpa) [4]. Telle est semble-t-il, la position qui résulte du nouveau Code pénal, dont les dispositions sur les causes d'irresponsabilités ne sont pas limitées aux crimes et aux délits.

Ce qui a pu faire croire que la faute n'était pas nécessaire en matière de contravention, c'est que la faute contraventionnelle n'a généralement pas à être prouvée et que, d'autre part, la preuve de l'absence de faute ne libère pas le contrevenant [5]. Or cela tient à ce que dans la plupart des contraventions, la faute n'a pas du tout la même nature que dans les délits d'imprudence.

§ 2. Distinction de la faute d'imprudence et de la faute contraventionnelle

A. Particularités de ces deux fautes

275 Notion de faute d'imprudence ◇ La faute d'imprudence, qui n'est pas définie d'une façon générale par le Code pénal, consiste d'après les articles 221-6, 222-19 et R. 625-2 du nouveau Code pénal « en une maladresse, imprudence, inattention, négligence ou manquement à une obliga-

1. Crim. 7 mars 1918, S. 1921.I.89, note ROUX.
2. V. en matière de fraude (art. L. 213-4 C. Cons.) : Crim. 22 août 1995, Bull. n° 268 : V. aussi supra n° 254.
3. Crim. 15 mai 1926, S. 1929.I.33, note ROUX.
4. LÉGAL,« La responsabilité sans faute et les délits matériels », Mélanges Patin, p. 129.
5. V. Crim. 16 nov. 1976, Bull. n° 325.

5820

tion de prudence ou de sécurité imposée par la loi ou les règlements ». En outre, le manquement délibéré à une obligation de sécurité ou de prudence imposée par la loi ou le règlement est pris en compte par le nouveau Code pénal, ce qui constitue soit une infraction autonome, soit une circonstance aggravante. Dans ce dernier cas, il y a mise en danger, qui constitue une faute aggravée, mais la sanction dépendra encore du résultat produit et non vraiment voulu.

Commet en tout cas une faute d'imprudence, l'automobiliste qui, par son manque d'habileté ou par la violation d'une disposition du Code de la route [1] (vitesse excessive, non-respect d'un stop, franchissement d'une ligne continue), tue ou blesse quelqu'un. De même, une faute pénale d'imprudence peut être reprochée au chirurgien ou à l'anesthésiste qui ne prend pas avant, pendant ou même après une opération, les précautions conformes aux données acquises de la science contre les risques prévisibles de mort de l'opéré [2].

Bien que le résultat n'en ait été ni voulu ni même prévu, cette faute qui est semblable à la faute d'imprudence ou de négligence de l'art. 1383 C. civ., n'engage pas seulement la responsabilité civile de son auteur (obligation de réparer le dommage), mais aussi sa responsabilité pénale, car elle entraîne, pour la sécurité publique, des dangers qu'il faut réprimer et prévenir par la menace d'une peine.

En vue, cependant, de limiter certains excès révélés par des poursuites récentes, une loi du 13 mai 1996 avait modifié l'art. 121-3 C. Pén. Selon ce texte, il n'y a pas faute si l'auteur des faits a accompli les diligences normales compte tenu de la nature des missions ou des fonctions, des compétences, du pouvoir et des moyens dont il disposait.

En conséquence de cette précision qui concerne toute personne, des dispositions particulières ont été insérées dans le Code général des collectivités territoriales pour prohiber la condamnation d'un maire, d'un président de Conseil général ou d'un président de Conseil régional ou des personnes ayant reçu délégation pour des faits non intentionnels commis dans l'exercice des fonctions s'il est établi que l'élu a

1. Cette violation du Code de la route peut être retenue, même si elle n'a pas été poursuivie : Crim. 21 févr. 1996, Bull. n° 83 ; V. aussi Crim. 28 juin 1995, Bull. n° 242.

2. Trib. Montpellier 21 déc. 1970, D. 1971.637, note CHABAS ; Cour de Montpellier, 5 mai 1971, J.C.P. 1971.II.16783, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1971, p. 681, n° 1-II ; Crim. 22 juin 1972, Bull. n° 217 ; Toulouse, 24 avril 1973, Gaz. Pal., 1973.I.401, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1973, p. 900, n° 2.IV-A (toutes intervenues dans l'affaire Albertine SARRAZIN) ; Crim.22 juin 1972, Bull. n° 218, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1973, p. 902, n° 2-IV-b ; Crim. 18 nov. 1976, Bull. n° 333, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1977, p. 336, n° 2-III ; Crim. 26 janv.1977, Bull. n° 38, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1977, p. 577 ; Marseille, 24 févr. 1977, Gaz. Pal., 29 janv. 1978, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1978, n° 2 ; Paris, 5 mai 1977, Gaz. Pal., 12 févr. 1978, obs. LEVASSEUR, eod. loc. ; Crim. 9 juin 1977, J.C.P. 1978.II.18839, note R. SAVATIER, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1978, n° 1 ; Crim. 9 nov. 1977, Bull. n° 346, D. 1978, Inf. Rap., 71, obs. ROUJOU DE BOUBÉE, J.C.P., 1978.IV.12, Gaz. Pal., 19 avr. 1978 ; Crim. 9 juill. 1979, J.C.P., 1980.II.19272 note CHABAS ; Crim. 10 mai 1984, Bull. crim., n° 167 ; Crim. 23 nov. 1994, Dr. pén. 1995, n° 88, obs. VÉRON ; Crim. 19 février 1997, Bull. n° 67, J.C.P. 1997.II.22889 note J.Y. CHEVALLIER, D. 1998, p. 236 note LEGROS.

3194

accompli des « diligences normales », compte tenu de ses compétences, des pouvoirs et des moyens dont il disposait ainsi que des difficultés propres aux missions confiées (cf. art. 2123-34, 3123-28, 4135-28 et 4422-10-1 C.G. coll. terr.). Les fonctionnaires et les agents non titulaires de droit public sont soumis à un régime identique (cf. art. 11 bis A loi du 13 juillet 1983). On pouvait se demander si la loi nouvelle était de nature à endiguer les excès [1]. De fait, si l'agent a été diligent, aucune faute ne peut lui être reprochée. Inversement s'il a commis une imprudence, le respect des diligences normales n'évitera pas la poursuite [2]. Une faute imputable au prévenu suffit [3], la loi du 13 mai 1996 n'ayant pas instiué un fait justificatif nouveau [4].

1-1 La précision de la définition de la faute non-intentionnelle ◇
Malgré l'apport de la loi su 13 mai 1996, des groupes d'étude ont tenté de rechercher le moyen de limiter la responsabilité pénale des élus et des fonctionnaires (commission MASSOT). Finalement, un proposition de loi du Sénateur FAUCHON, après modifications et aménagements, a abouti à la loi 2000-647 du 10 juillet 2000, qui aménage l'alinéa 3 de l'art. 121-3 du C. Pén., et ajoute un alinéa 4 au même article.

En ce qui concerne l'alinéa 3 de l'art. 121-3, la faute s'entend toujours de l'imprudence, de la négligence ou du manquement à une obligation de prudence ou de sécurité prévue par la loi ou le règlement. Mais au lieu d'écarter l'incidence de cette faute, en cas de diligences normales (« sauf si »), le texte nouveau indique que la faute requiert que l'agent n'ait pas accompli les diligences normales, compte tenu de la nature des missions, des fonctions ou des compétences, ou du pourvoi ou des moyens dont il disposait. Eu égard aux solutions intervenues depuis la loi du 13 mai 1996, le dispositif nouveau ne paraît pas de nature à limiter la notion de faute pénale, car l'imprudence découle souvent du défaut de diligences normales.

En revanche, beaucoup plus novatrice est la disposition de l'art. 121-3 al. 4 C. Pénal. Dans l'hypothèse d'une imprudence, les personnes physiques qui n'ont pas causé directement le dommage mais qui ont créé ou contribué à créer la situation ayant permis la réalisation du dommage ou n'ont pas pris les mesures permettant de l'éviter, ne sont responsables pénalement que s'il est établi qu'elles ont, soit violé de façon manifestement délibérée, une obligation particulière de prudence ou de sécurité prévue par la loi ou le réglement, soit commis une faute caractérisée, exposant autrui à un risque d'une particulière gravité qu'elles ne pouvaient ignorer. Sous réserve de l'interprétation des tribunaux, les fautes lointaines ne seront source de responsabilité pénale que si elles sont dument établies ; bref si ce sont des fautes lourdes. La faute légère lointaine ne sera plus une faute pénale, mais elle demeurera éventuellement une faute civile.

1. V. M.L. RASSAT, Dr. pén. 1996, chr. 28.
2. V. d'ailleurs : Crim. 2 avril 1997, Bull. n° 132 ; Crim. 17 et 24 juin 1997, Bull. n° 237 et 251 ; Crim. 29 juin 1999, Bull. n° 163 ; Crim. 9 nov. 1999, Bull. n° 250.
3. Crim. 5 mars 1997, Bull. n° 89.
4. Crim. 14 octobre 1997, Bull. n° 334, Rev. sc. crim. 1998 p. 328, obs. Y. MAYRAUD, RTD Com. 1998 p. 431 obs. BOULOC.

5822

Il faut noter que les art. 221-6, 222-19 et 222-20 C. Pén. sont harmonisés avec le nouvel art. 121-3 C. P., ainsi d'ailleurs que les différents textes concernant les maires, président de conseil général ou de conseil régional (art. L. 2123-34, 3123-28 et 4135-28 C.G. Coll. Terr.). Les fonctionnaires, agents publics non titulaires et militaires sont traités comme les élus (cf. art. 11 bis A loi du 13 juillet 1983 et art. 16-1 loi du 13 juillet 1972), tous devant bénéficier de la protection de la collectivité ou de l'État, en cas de poursuites pénales pour des faits n'ayant pas le caractère de faute détachable de l'exercice des fonctions.

276 L'identité de la faute pénale et de la faute civile d'imprudence ◇
Après avoir pendant longtemps distingué la faute pénale et la faute civile et consacré la thèse de la dualité des fautes, la jurisprudence, depuis 1912 [1], adoptant la thèse contraire de l'unité des fautes, décide que la faute pénale d'imprudence est identique à la faute civile. Il en résulte que celui qui est déclaré coupable d'une faute pénale d'imprudence peut être condamné non seulement à une peine, mais aussi à des dommages-intérêts envers la victime. Mais à l'inverse, celui qui est reconnu non coupable de cette faute par le tribunal correctionnel, ne peut être condamné ni à une peine, ni à des dommages-intérêts sur la base d'une faute civile des articles 1382 et 1383 du Code civil. Il reste toutefois possible, malgré l'absence de faute pénale d'imprudence, de le faire condamner par le tribunal civil à payer une réparation à la victime de l'accident, sur la base de l'article 1384, alinéa 1 du Code civil ou de la loi sur les accidents de la circulation, car la présomption de responsabilité édictée par ces textes à l'encontre du gardien d'une chose inanimée ou du conducteur qui a causé un dommage, est entièrement distincte de la faute pénale. Afin de protéger les victimes, la loi du 8 juillet 1983 a autorisé les tribunaux correctionnels ou de police à accorder, d'après les règles du droit civil, la réparation de tous dommages résultant des faits ayant fondé la poursuite (art. 470-1 C.P.P.), à la condition que le tribunal ait été saisi, à l'initiative du parquet ou sur renvoi d'une juridiction d'instruction, de poursuites exercées pour une infraction non intentionnelle au sens des al. 2 et 3 de l'art. 121-3 C. Pén., et qu'il ait prononcé une relaxe [2]. En tout cas, la Cour de Cassation avait pris nettement parti en faveur du maintien du principe d'unité de la faute pénale et de la faute civile d'imprudence, malgré l'intervention de la loi de 1983 [3].

La loi du 10 juillet 2000 en limitant la responsabilité pénale des personnes physiques n'ayant pas causé directement le dommage, en l'absence de faute caractérisée ou de violation manifestement délibérée d'une obligation particulière de prudence ou de sécurité, a entendu revenir sur la jurisprudence

1. Civ. 19 déc. 1912, S. 1914.I.249, note MOREL. Cette jurisprudence a été maintenue après la loi du 8 juillet 1983, voir : Crim. 18 nov. 1985, Bull. crim., n° 343, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1987, p. 427.

2. Le juge ne saurait en faire application d'office (crim. 12 février 1997, Bull. n° 56). Cf. Précis de Procédure Pénale, 17e éd. n°s 311 et 592.

3. Crim. 18 nov. 1986, Bull. n° 343, Rev. sc. crim., 1987.426, obs. LEVASSEUR ; BOUILLANE DE LACOSTE, Gaz. Pal., 1987.1 Doc. 297.

3196

5823

de la Cour de cassation. L'art 4-1 nouveau C.P.P. prévoie que l'absence de faute pénale non intentionnelle ne fait pas obstacle à l'exercice, devant un juge civil, d'une action en réparation d'un dommage, fondée sur l'art. 1383 du C. civ. ou sur l'art. L. 452-1 C. Séc. Soc. La faute pénale serait donc plus importante que la faute civile d'imprudence ou la faute inexcusable. Corrélativement, le juge pénal saisi d'une poursuite pour infraction non intentionnelle engagée par le ministère public ou sur renvoi d'une juridiction d'instruction, demeure compétent, malgré une relaxe, pour statuer sur la réparation due à la victime, selon les règles du droit civil (art. 470-1 C.P.P. modifié). Il semble que cette faculté s'appliquera plutôt dans l'hypothèse prévue par l'art. 121-3 al. 4, et à la condition que la faute indirecte soit en relation causale avec le dommage invoqué.

377 Notion de faute contraventionnelle ◇ En revanche, la faute contraventionnelle ne peut être assimilée à la faute pénale ou civile d'imprudence. A la différence de la faute d'imprudence, la faute en matière de contravention non intentionnelle (sauf s'il s'agit d'une contravention d'imprudence – art. R. 625-2 et R. 625-3 C. pén.) n'exige même pas une imprudence ou une négligence ; elle résulte du seul fait de la violation de la prescription légale ou réglementaire. Il importe peu, sauf pour certaines contraventions, que cette violation ait été intentionnelle, volontaire, commise par imprudence ou de bonne foi, dans l'ignorance du règlement. Pour un certain nombre de délits, l'élément moral consiste, parfois, en une faute contraventionnelle [1].

Toutefois, même les fautes contraventionnelles ne peuvent engager la responsabilité de leur auteur que si celui-ci a une volonté libre. C'est pourquoi le fait cesse d'être punissable si l'agent peut invoquer un cas de force majeure [2], un état de démence ou de nécessité [3], l'absence de maturité, etc [4].

B. Conséquences de la différence de nature

378 Sur le plan de la preuve ◇ De la différence de nature entre la faute d'imprudence et la faute contraventionnelle, il résulte tout d'abord une différence importante au point de vue de la preuve. Tandis que la faute pénale des articles 221-6 et 222-19 du nouveau Code pénal doit, comme l'intention dans les infractions intentionnelles, être prouvée par l'accusation, la

1. V. par exemple : Crim. 4 janv. 1973, Bull. n° 6, D. 1973, Inf. Rap., p. 18 (infraction à la police de la navigation) ; Crim. 28 avr. 1977, Bull. n° 148, D. 1978.149, note M.L. RASSAT, J.C.P., 1978.II.18931, note Mme DELMAS-MARTY (délit de pollution des cours d'eaux) ; Crim. 16 nov. 1976, Bull. n° 325 (l'excuse tirée de la bonne foi ne fait pas disparaître la contravention dès lors que le fait punissable est régulièrement constaté) ; T.G.I. Nancy, 6 janv. 1978, D. 1978.447, note M.L. RASSAT (même solution) ; Crim. 22 décembre 1987, Bull. n° 482, affichage irrégulier. Sur les délits dits « contraventionnels », cf. infra, n° 282.

2. Crim. 31 juill. 1937, D.H. 1937, p. 523.

3. Trib. pol. Verdun 20 mars 1987, Gaz. Pal., 18 juill. 1987.

4. Tel est bien l'avis de A.C. DANA. « En tant qu'action humaine l'infraction est un tout indivisible. Elle est la traduction d'une volonté consciente et libre. Elle existe ou elle n'existe pas » (p. 273).

3197

5824

faute contraventionnelle (sauf s'il s'agit d'une contravention d'imprudence ou volontaire) n'a pas à être prouvée par le ministère public. Cette dispense de preuve est pour la majorité des auteurs la conséquence d'une présomption de faute en matière de contravention. Pour quelques autres (notamment Legros, « L'élément moral dans les infractions ») elle résulte de ce que le seul fait de commettre une contravention constitue par lui-même une faute. Du moment que le fait matériel est établi, la faute contraventionnelle existe ; en prouvant le fait, on prouve par là même la faute (res ipsa loquitur).

279 Conséquence quant à la nécessité d'un dommage ◇ La différence de nature entre la faute d'imprudence et la faute contraventionnelle commande aussi une autre différence en ce qui concerne la nécessité de l'existence d'un dommage.

A cet égard, la faute d'imprudence se rapproche de la faute civile. De même que la faute civile n'engage la responsabilité que s'il en résulte un dommage, la faute pénale d'imprudence — et par là, le délit pénal d'imprudence s'apparente au délit civil [1] — n'entraîne la responsabilité pénale de son auteur que lorsqu'un préjudice physique (homicide, blessure) a été réalisé.

De plus, comme en droit civil, le préjudice doit résulter de la faute pénale qui a été commise (lien de causalité entre la faute et le dommage) [2]. A cet égard, une première théorie consiste à retenir toutes les conditions, positives ou négatives, qui ont produit le résultat incriminé (théorie de l'équivalence des conditions), tandis que d'autres systèmes soutiennent qu'il convient de ne prendre que les causes les plus proches de l'événement, ce qui limite la chaîne de causalité.

280 De manière générale, la jurisprudence adoptait plutôt la théorie de l'équivalence des conditions. En matière d'imprudence [3], elle décidait que les articles 221-6 et 222-19 du nouveau Code pénal n'exigent pas, pour recevoir application, un lien de causalité direct et immédiat entre le comportement de l'agent et le résultat dommageable [4], ni même que la faute ait été la cause

1. A telle enseigne qu'il n'y a pas de faute pénale en cas de force majeure, comme en droit civil : Crim. 18 déc. 1978, J.C.P., 1980.II.19263.

2. La Cour de cassation contrôle la qualification du lien de causalité entre la faute et le dommage : Crim. 2 mars 1994, Bull. n° 85.

3. La solution est différente en cas de coups mortels : Crim. 8 janvier 1991, Bull. n° 14, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim. 1991, p. 760.

4. Crim. 19 mai 1958, Bull. n° 395 ; Crim. 14 janv. 1971, D. 1971.164, rapport J. ROBERT ; Crim. 7 févr. 1973, Bull. n° 72, D. 1973, Inf. Rap., p. 45 ; Crim. 28 mars 1973, Bull. n° 157, D. 1973, Inf. Rap., p. 115 ; Crim. 21 mai 1974, Bull. n° 187, D. 1974 I.R., p. 155 ; Crim. 19 juin 1974, Bull. n° 228, D. 1974 I.R. p. 195 ; Crim. 8 août 1977, Bull. n° 277, D. 1977, Inf. Rap., 493 ; Crim. 16 mars 1977, Bull. n° 98, D. 1977.469, note critique MORANGE ; Crim. 8 août 1977, D. 1977, I.R. 493 ; Crim. 19 mai 1978, D. 1978, Inf. Rap., 345, obs. ROUJOU DE BOUBÉE, D. 1980, J. 3 note Mme GALIA-BEAUCHESNE.

Cependant il faut que le lien de causalité entre la faute du prévenu et le décès ou les blessures de la victime soit certain, pour que le prévenu puisse être condamné. Crim. 6 oct. 1977, D. 1977, Inf. Rap. ; 417 Paris, 20 avril 1977, Gaz. Pal., 1977.2.575, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1978, p. 98 ; unique des blessures ou de l'homicide [1] ; elle retient le délit pénal même si la faute n'a été que la cause médiate [2]. Il suffit que le lien de causalité soit certain [3]. Cette conception jurisprudentielle devrait être remise en cause du fait de la loi du 10 juillet 2000 qui procède à une distinction entre les personnes qui ont causé directement le dommage et les autres. La théorie de la causalité adéquate devrait limiter le nombre des personnes susceptibles de répondre pénalement d'une imprudence ou négligence.

3198

5825

Enfin, comme en droit civil où la réparation est proportionnée à l'étendue du dommage, la sanction de la faute pénale d'imprudence dépend de la gravité du dommage. Cette faute a-t-elle provoqué la mort, elle constitue un délit correctionnel passible de trois ans d'emprisonnement (art. 221-6). En cas de simples blessures, elle constitue, soit un délit correctionnel punissable de deux ans d'emprisonnement, si ces blessures ont entraîné une incapacité totale de travail personnel de plus de trois mois (art. 222-19 C. Pén.), soit une contravention de police, punissable d'une amende de 10 000 F, si l'incapacité totale de travail en résultant n'excède pas trois mois (art. R.625-2 C. Pén.) [4].

311 En matière de contravention au contraire — réserve faite des contraventions qui supposent une intention [5] ou une faute d'imprudence [6] et qui ne peuvent être réprimées que s'il en est résulté un préjudice physique ou matériel — d'une façon générale, l'existence d'un dommage n'est pas nécessaire à la répression. La faute contraventionnelle est punie pour elle-même, indépendamment de tout résultat dommageable. Cela tient à ce que la contravention consiste le plus souvent dans une désobéissance à une mesure de police, à une règle jugée nécessaire au maintien de l'ordre et destinée à prévenir des atteintes à la sécurité ou à éviter des dommages (art. R. 610-5 C. Pén.) Au lieu de se projeter sur le plan de la conscience juridique ou

Crim. 6 oct. 1977, D. 1977, Inf. Rap. ; 417 ; Crim. 9 juill. 1979, J.C.P., 1980.II.19272 note F. CHABAS ; Crim. 7 janv. 1980, Bull. n° 10 ; Crim. 27 nov. 1984, Bull. n° 369 ; Crim. 14 févr. 1996, Bull. n° 78.

1. Crim. 13 oct. 1980, Bull. n° 256 ; Crim. 25 mai 1982, Bull. n° 134 ; Crim. 24 janvier 1989, Bull. n° 27.

2. Crim. 18 nov. 1927, S. 1928.I.192 ; Crim. 14 mars 1956, J.C.P., 1956.IV.61. V. également, Tribunal pour enfant de Marseille, 11 juin 1964, D. 1965.381, note G. V. Et, à propos d'un homicide involontaire reproché à un chirurgien et un anesthésiste, les arrêts rendus dans l'Affaire Albertine SARRAZIN, cités supra n° 265 ; Crim. 9 mars 1977, D. 1978, Inf. Rap. ; 71 ; Crim. 9 juin 1977 ; J.C.P. 1978.II.18839, note SAVATIER ; Crim. 11 juill. 1977, Bull. n° 261, obs. LEVASSEUR, Rev. sc. crim., 1978, p. 100 ; Crim. 5 janv. 1988, Bull. n° 7 (action dangereuse menée en commun).

3. Crim. 20 mai 1980, D. 1981, I.R. 257 obs. PENNEAU ; Crim. 10 janv. 1991, dr pén. 1991, p. 69, Rev. sc. crim., 1992, p. 77, obs. G. LEVASSEUR.

4. En cas de manquement délibéré à une obligation de sécurité ou de prudence imposée par un texte, les peines sont aggravées soit 5 ans de prison au lieu de trois (art. 221-6 C. Pén.), 3 ans au lieu de deux (art. 222-19) ; et la contravention de l'art. R. 625-2 devient alors le délit de l'art. 222-20 C. Pén.

5. Art. R. 625-1, R. 635-1, R. 654-1, R. 655-1.

6. Art. R. 625-2, R. 625-3, R. 653-1.

3199

5826

morale, la contravention n'est que la lésion d'intérêt administratifs ; c'est on l'a dit, « du droit pénal de bagatelles ».

En résumé, si dans toutes les infractions, il existe un élément mora (l'intention dans les infractions intentionnelles, la faute dans les infrac tions non intentionnelles), dans les infractions non intentionnelles, tantô la faute doit être soutenue par le préjudice (en cas de délit d'imprudence) tantôt elle est réprimée du fait seul de la violation de la prescription légale o réglementaire établie dans l'intérêt de la sécurité publique même s'il n'y pas dommage (dans le cas de la plupart des contraventions de police).

SECTION 3. LA DISTINCTION DES INFRACTIONS INTENTIONNELLES ET NON INTENTIONNELLES

Suivant que l'élément moral consiste dans l'intention ou dans une simpl faute, on distingue l'infraction intentionnelle et l'infraction non intention nelle.

§ 1. Principe de la distinction

282 Les infractions intentionnelles dans la catégorie desquelles rentrent le crimes, les délits correctionnels et même quelques contraventions de polic supposent une intention coupable ; elles ne sont punissables que si cett intention est établie [1].

Les infractions non intentionnelles au contraire – qui comprennent le délits d'imprudence, la plupart des contraventions de police et même cer tains délits correctionnels punissables malgré la bonne foi de leur auteu

1. En cas de fraude dans les ventes de marchandises (loi du 1er août 1905) qui est un dél intentionnel, la preuve de l'intention coupable est rapportée dès qu'il est établi que le prévenu so connaissait la fraude, soit était sans excuse (parce que spécialiste), d'en avoir ignoré les circon tances constitutives. Ainsi, « le seul fait par un commerçant spécialisé dans la vente de véhicul d'occasion, sans en avoir vérifié le degré d'usure et en laissant croire que ce véhicule n'ava parcouru qu'un nombre de kilomètres inférieur au nombre réel ; ce fait constitue d'une part, le fa matériel de tromperie sur les qualités substantielles de la marchandise vendue et d'autre part, suff à caractériser, au sens de la loi du 1er août 1905, l'élément intentionnel du délit ». (Crim. 21 juil 1977, D. 1978, Inf. Rap., 111, observations PUECH ; Crim. 17 oct. 1991, Bull. n° 356).

De même, en cas de délit de publicité mensongère, qui n'exige pas la mauvaise foi (loi du 27 dé 1973, art. 44-1) mais comporte toujours un élément intentionnel, la preuve de cet élément mor est établie, dès l'instant que le prévenu ne pouvait ignorer que la marchandise, qu'il vendait sou telle appellation, était bien différente de celle qui bénéficiait de cette appellation (Paris, 13 m 1977 et 18 nov. 1977, D. 1978, Inf. Rap. ; 72, note ROUJOU DE BOUBÉE ; V. aussi Crim. 8 mai 197 Bull. n° 167 ; Crim. 3 janvier 1984, Bull. crim. n° 1 ; Crim. 4 févr. 1986, Bull. crim. n° 45 ; Crim 3 déc. 1987, Bull. n° 456).

L'emploi d'un travailleur étranger en situation irrégulière est un délit intentionnel (Crim 1er oct. 1987, Bull. n° 327).

3200

5827

(délits de pêche, de chasse, en matière de douanes [1], de contributions indirectes, certaines infractions à la législation pharmaceutique, à la législation économique, délit de pollution des cours d'eau) — impliquent simplement une faute (V. art. 339, loi du 16 déc. 1992), qui peut consister dans la seule violation de la prescription légale ou réglementaire et dont la preuve, parfois même, n'est pas à la charge du ministère public [2]. L'ignorance de la loi ou du règlement peut constituer, en soi, la faute indispensable.

§ 2. Intérêts de la distinction

133 De ce que l'intention criminelle requise pour les premières ne l'est pas pour les secondes, il résulte que toutes les règles du droit pénal qui se rattachent à l'existence de l'intention criminelle ne peuvent s'appliquer aux infractions non intentionnelles. C'est ainsi que la tentative, toujours punissable en matière de crimes et parfois en matière de délits correctionnels (lorsque la loi l'a prévue), n'est pas punissable en matière de délits d'imprudence ni de contraventions.

De même, l'erreur de fait qui, dans les infractions intentionnelles, peut faire disparaître l'intention et muer celle-ci en une faute d'imprudence (changer un crime de meurtre en un délit d'homicide par imprudence), est sans effet dans les infractions non intentionnelles [3]. Quant à l'erreur de droit de l'art. 122-3 C. Pén., elle paraît ne devoir être admise qu'en cas d'agissement volontaire. Enfin, la légitime défense n'est pas acceptée par la jurisprudence dans l'hypothèse d'infraction non intentionnelle commise par l'agresseur [4].

En matière de complicité, la distinction du délit intentionnel et du délit non intentionnel ne présente plus d'intérêt, car la complicité réprimée en cas de crimes et de délits intentionnels mais non en cas de contraventions, sauf en cas de provocation (art. 121-7 et R. 610-2 C. Pén.), est, d'après la jurisprudence et quelques dispositions légales [5], punissable même en cas de délits non intentionnels [6], et de délits d'imprudence [7].

1. V. de GARDIA, « L'élément intentionnel dans les infractions douanières », Rev. sc. crim., 1990, p. 487 ; note BERR sous crim. 26 mars 1989, D. 1989.515 ; note PANNIER sous crim. 1er oct. 1990, Gaz. Pal., 11 mai 1990.

2. Lorsque l'élément moral d'une infraction consiste dans une faute, dont la preuve n'a pas à être spécialement rapportée par l'accusation, et que le prévenu n'est exonéré de toute responsabilité pénale que s'il démontre la force majeure, la Cour de Cassation qualifie cette infraction de « matérielle » (Voir en particulier, à propos du délit de pollution des cours d'eaux de l'art. L. 232-2 du N. Code rural : Crim. 28 avr. 1977, D. 1978, J. 149, note M.L. RASSAT).

3. Voir infra, n° 440.

4. Crim. 16 février 1967, Bull. n° 70, J.C.P. 1967.II.25034, note COMBALDIEU ; Crim. 28 nov. 1991, Bull. n° 446, Rev. sc. crim., 1992.751, obs. LEVASSEUR.

5. En ce qui concerne le délit de publicité mensongère, la loi du 27 déc. 1973 (art. 44) prévoit que la « complicité est punissable dans les conditions du droit commun ».

6. Crim. 14 nov. 1924, S. 1925.I.232.

7. Chambéry, 9 mars 1956, J.C.P., 1956.I.9224, note VOUIN. Cette solution est cependant contestée par de nombreux auteurs.

3201

5828

284 Bibliographie ◇

ACCOMANDO et GUÉRY — « Le délit de risque causé à autrui ou de la malencontre à l'art. 223-1 N.C. Pén. », Rev. sc. crim. 1994, p. 68.

AUSSEL — « Le concept de responsabilité pénale », Colloque de Toulouse.

BERNARDINI — L'intention coupable en droit pénal, thèse (ronéo), Nice, 1976, 2 vol.

BERRÉVILLE — « Quelques réflexions sur l'élément moral de l'infraction », Rev. sc. crim., 1973, 865.

BOCCARA — Dol criminel et dol civil, thèse Paris, 1952.

CEDRAS (J.) — « La mise en danger d'autrui », D. 1995 chr. 18

CHABAS — « La contravention », Rev. sc. crim., 1969, p. 1 et 281.

CHABAS — Responsabilité civile et responsabilité pénale, éd. Montchrestien.

CHAVANNE et Mlle M.C. FAYARD — « Les délits d'imprudence », Rev. sc. crim., 1975, 5.

Colloque de Science Criminelle, Toulouse janv. 1969 « Confrontation de la théorie générale de la responsabilité pénale avec les données de la criminologie ». Ann. Fac. Dr. Toulouse, t. XVII, fasc. 1, et Dalloz 1969.

Colloque de Science Criminelle, Toulouse, septembre 1975, « La culpabilité », Ann. Univ. Toulouse 1976, not. rapport général de synthèse de R. MERLE (également Rev. sc. crim., 1976, p. 29).

CONTE (Ph.) — « La bonne foi en matière de diffamation ; notion et rôle » Mélanges Chavanne (1990), p. 49.

COSTA (J.-L.) — « Les infractions involontaires », Rev. sc. crim., 1963, p. 731.

DEFRANCE (G.) — « La mise en danger imputable à un conducteur de véhicule », Jurisp. Auto. 1998, p. 268.

DEPREZ — « Faute pénale et faute civile », dans Quelques aspects de l'autonomie du droit pénal, p. 157 à 185.

DUVAL — Le dol éventuel, thèse Paris 1900.

GUARDIA (de) — « L'élément intentionnel dans les infractions douanières », Rev. sc. crim. 1990, p.487.

JIMENEZ DE ASUA — « La faute consciente et le dolus eventualis », Rev. crim. 1959-1960 p. 603.

LAGRANGE-SOCCORO — Le délit prétérintentionnel, thèse Paris, 1962.

LASSALLE (J.-Y.) — La confrontation du concept de responsabilité pénale avec les données de la criminologie et des sciences de l'homme, thèse Aix, 1977.

LEBRET — « Essai sur la notion d'intention criminelle », Rev. sc. crim., 1938, p. 438 et suiv.

LEGAL — « La responsabilité sans faute », Mélanges Patin, p. 129.

LEGROS — L'élément moral dans les infractions, thèse Bruxelles, 1951.

LEVASSEUR — « Les aspects psychologiques du comportement criminel ; l'élément moral de l'infraction en droit français (contribution à l'étude de la mens rea) ». Travaux 4e Colloque internat. dr. comparé, Ottawa, 1966, p. 111.

3202

5829

LE VASSEUR — « Étude de l'élément moral de l'infraction », rapport au Colloque de Toulouse 1969.
MERCADAL — « Recherches sur l'intention en droit pénal », Rev. sc. crim. 1967, p. 1.
MERLE (Ph.) — Les présomptions légales en droit pénal, thèse Nancy, 1968.
MIMIN — « L'intention et le mobile ». Mélanges Patin, 1966, p. 113.
PINATEL — « La théorie pénale de l'intention devant les sciences de l'homme », Mélanges Lebret, p. 181.
PIROVANO — Faute civile et faute pénale, thèse Nice, 1964.
PRADEL (J.) — « La véritable portée de la loi du 10 juillet 2000 sur la définition des délits non intentionnels », D. 2000 n° 29, p. V.
PUECH — « La mise en danger d'autrui », D. 1994, chr. 153.
REBUT — L'omission en droit pénal, thèse Bordeaux, 1994.
ROKOPHYLLOS — Les infractions de lésion et la répression de la délinquance par imprudence, thèse Paris, 1963.
SALVAGE (Ph.) — « La mise en danger d'autrui », J.C.P. 1996.I.3984
SOULIGNAC — L'élément moral dans les infractions en droit pénal, thèse (dactyl.), Nancy, 1955.
TROUSSE — « Le mobile justificatif », Rev. crim., 1962-1963, p. 418.
VERHAEGEN — « L'élément fautif en matière de contravention aux règlements », Rev. crim., 1988, p. 289.
WAGNER — La notion d'intention dans la doctrine classique et la jurisprudence contemporaine, thèse Clermont, 1976.
YOTOPOULOS-MARANGOPOULOS (Mme) — Les mobiles du délit : Étude de criminologie et de droit pénal suisse et comparé, préf. di Tullio, Lib. Gen. Dr. e jurisp., 1974.

3203

5830

DROIT PRIVÉ

PRÉCIS

Droit pénal général

Gaston Stefani
Georges Levasseur
Bernard Bouloc

17e édition

DALLOZ

3204

5831

Droit pénal général

17e édition

2000

Gaston Stefani

Georges Levasseur
Professeur honoraire à l'Université de droit,
d'économie et de sciences sociales de Paris

Bernard Bouloc
Professeur à l'Université Panthéon-Sorbonne (Paris I)

DALLOZ

AC

3205

5832

CHAPITRE 1

LES PERSONNES RESPONSABLES

389 Dans la conception classique qui est celle du Code pénal français, la notion de délinquant est étroitement liée à celle d'infraction. Pour être délinquant, il faut avoir commis une infraction, c'est-à-dire, non pas un acte quelconque préjudiciable à la société, mais un acte prévu et puni par la loi pénale. Or, comme l'infraction suppose un élément moral, ni les choses, ni les animaux qui n'ont ni intelligence, ni volonté, ne peuvent être sujets actifs d'une infraction et poursuivis comme délinquants [1]. Seuls les êtres humains peuvent être délinquants ; or les êtres humains, ce sont les personnes physiques.

Est-ce à dire que les groupements de personnes physiques — auxquels la loi reconnaît une existence juridique distincte de celles des individus qui les composent, qui ont un patrimoine, des droits et des obligations propres, et qu'on appelle les personnes morales (sociétés, associations, syndicats) — ne puissent jamais commettre d'infraction et engager leur responsabilité pénale ? Depuis le nouveau Code pénal, la responsabilité pénale des personnes morales est admise en principe par la loi, en plus de celle des personnes physiques qui ont matériellement commis l'infraction . C'est qu'en effet, sont délinquants, non seulement ceux qui ont commis eux même l'acte, mais encore ceux qui ont aidé à réaliser l'acte matériel constitutif de l'infraction (complicité). Il restera à se demander, si du fait de la proclamation du principe de la responsabilité pénale de son propre fait, il est possible d'admettre qu'une personne (un chef d'entreprise par exemple) puisse être responsable pénalement de l'acte matériel commis par autrui. Aussi examinera-t-on successivement :

Section 1. — La détermination des personnes responsables.

Section 2. — Le complice.

Section 3. — Le pénalement responsable du fait d'autrui.

1. V. pour quelques exemples de procès faits, dans l'ancien droit français à des animaux, Mme DELMAS-MARTY, « Les chemins de la répression », p. 35.

3206

C. L'intention criminelle

333 L'intention criminelle ◇ Troisième et dernière condition de la répression de la complicité, elle constitue en quelque sorte l'élément moral de l'incrimination de la complicité.

Pour que le complice soit punissable, il faut qu'il ait participé en connaissance de cause à l'infraction principale, qu'il ait su qu'il s'associait à un crime ou à un délit déterminé, comme un meurtre ou un vol. Il faut « l'intention de contribuer à l'acte délictueux consommé ou tenté par autrui [1] ». On ne pourrait par exemple considérer comme complice d'un meurtre exécuté avec un fusil de chasse, celui qui aurait prêté le fusil au meurtrier pour lui permettre de chasser [2]. Mais la jurisprudence n'exige pas que le complice ait connu les circonstances aggravantes de l'infraction à laquelle il a voulu s'associer. L'exigence d'une intention criminelle personnelle au complice résulte de l'article 121-7 du C. Pén. qui vise la provocation à l'infraction et les instructions données « pour commettre » l'infraction (al. 2), et l'aide et l'assistance prêtées « sciemment » (al. 1er).

334 Notion d'intention du complice ◇ L'intention requise chez le complice est tout à fait distincte de l'intention criminelle ou de la faute pénale de l'auteur principal. Elle consiste toujours dans une faute intentionnelle, dans une volonté de s'associer intentionnellement à l'acte délictueux de l'auteur principal [3]. Le plus souvent, elle résulte d'une entente préalable avec celui-ci ; mais parfois, l'entente n'a lieu qu'au moment même de la commission de l'infraction. En tout cas, il faut, selon la formule des arrêts, que le complice et l'auteur principal aient agi « ensemble et de concert », en vue d'obtenir le résultat délictueux.

Il s'en suit que l'auteur d'une faute d'imprudence ne peut pas être poursuivi comme complice, même si cette imprudence ou cette négligence constitue une faute au point de vue civil et engage sa responsabilité civile. Mais dans le cas où l'infraction commise par l'auteur principal est une infraction involontaire, la faute pénale d'imprudence commise par un tiers

1. Crim. 6 août 1924, B. n° 323 ; Ch. Acc. Bourges, 17 mai 1963, D. 1963, 355 ; Trib. Nevers, 8 mai 1964, J.C.P. 1964-II-13.752 bis ; Crim. 16 mars 1970, J.C.P. 1971-II-16.813, note BOULOC ; « En l'état des faits constatés par eux et desquels ne ressort pas une participation volontaire à une escroquerie, les juges du fond peuvent relaxer celui qui est poursuivi comme complice » ; Crim. 25 juin 1979, Bull. n° 233.

2. Crim. 13 janv. 1955, D. 1955, 291, note CHAVANNE.

3. Elle suppose une conscience de s'associer à une infraction pénale et de favoriser la réalisation de cette infraction par une intervention volontaire. Voir notamment : Crim. 21 oct. 1948, Bull. crim. n° 242 ; Crim. 8 févr. 1950, J.C.P. 1950-IV-53 ; Crim. 26 nov. 1974, Bull. n° 349, D. 1975, I. R. p. 12. Il faut un fait de participation consciente du prévenu aux faits qui constituent l'infraction retenue contre l'auteur principal ; Crim. 15 févr. 1982, Bull. crim. n° 50, D. 1983, p. 275, note D. MAYER et J.-P. PIZZIO (complicité en matière de publicité trompeuse : le complice doit avoir fourni les moyens en connaissance de cause) ; Crim. 1er avril 1984, Gaz. Pal., 4 avril 1985. V. aussi R. KOERING-JOULIN, « L'élément moral de la complicité par fourniture de moyens ruineux », D. 1980, chr. 231.

5833

3207

5834

ne peut-elle pas être retenue à son encontre et le rendre punissable au titre de la complicité ? C'est la question de savoir si la complicité existe dans les délits d'imprudence.

Contrairement à une partie de la doctrine — pour qui dans ces infractions il ne peut y avoir de complices mais seulement des coauteurs, car la complicité suppose toujours chez le complice une intention délictueuse, — la jurisprudence admet parfois que la complicité s'applique à tous les délits, même aux délits non intentionnels [1].

135 Moment de l'intention ◇ La conscience chez le complice de participer à une infraction doit être concomitante de la fourniture des instructions ou de la prestation de l'aide ou de l'assistance. La Cour de cassation exige en effet que la connaissance ait existé chez le complice au moment même où il a, soit fourni les instructions et les moyens pour commettre l'infraction, soit prêté aide et assistance [2] mais il importe peu que l'acte principal ait été encore à l'état de projet lors de la fourniture des moyens [3]. En revanche, le fait d'avoir su par la suite que l'aide ou l'assistance avait permis ou facilité la commission d'une infraction n'est pas, d'après la jurisprudence, un acte de complicité punissable, faute d'intention chez le complice.

136 Preuve de l'intention ◇ Puisque la complicité ne peut être réprimée que s'il existe une intention personnelle au complice, c'est au Ministère public qu'il appartient de rapporter la preuve que le complice savait effectivement et au moment même où il a agi, que l'aide et l'assistance qu'il prêtait, allait servir à l'infraction. Cette action consciente peut résulter de la qualité de directeur d'un journal [4]. Elle peut aussi se déduire de comportement ultérieurs, même si la complicité ne peut pas résulter d'actes postérieurs au fait principal [5]. De toute façon, lorsqu'il retient la culpabilité d'un complice, le juge doit toujours préciser qu'il a constaté l'intention criminelle, et indiquer dans les motifs de sa décision sur quoi repose sa conviction [6].

1. Crim. 17 nov. 1887, B. n° 392 ; Crim. 14 déc. 1934, D. P. 1935-1-96 — à propos d'un homicide par imprudence, Chambéry, 8 mars 1956, J.C.P. 1956-II-9.224, note VOUIN. V. toutefois Crim. 24 oct. 1956, Bull. n° 375. Il y a complicité en matière de publicité trompeuse : Crim. 15 févr. 1982, Bull. n° 50 ; Crim. 23 avril 1997, Bull. n° 143.

2. Crim. 5 nov. 1943, D. A. 1944, 29 ; Paris 30 juin 1977, Rev. Jurisp. Com., 1978, p. 419, note B. BOULOC ; Crim. 28 juin 1995. Bull. n° 241 ; Crim 23 avril 1997, Bull. n° 143 ; Crim. 7 oct. 1998, Bull. n° 249. V. toutefois Crim. 15 novembre 1990, Bull. n° 388, Gaz. Pal., 28 mars 1991, note J.-P. DOUCET affirmant que l'élément intentionnel doit être apprécié au moment où les faits ont été commis.

3. Crim. 8 janvier 1991, Bull. n° 15.

4. Crim. 27 oct. 1992, Bull. n° 343.

5. Crim. 4 nov. 1991, Bull. n° 391.

6. Crim. 11 nov. 1921, D. 1922-1-64.

3208

5835

OXFORD

International Law

THIRD EDITION

Edited by Malcolm D. Evans online resource centre

3209

5836

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS
Great Clarendon Street, Oxford OX2 6DP
Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship,
and education by publishing worldwide in
Oxford New York
Auckland Cape Town Dar es Salaam Hong Kong Karachi
Kuala Lumpur Madrid Melbourne Mexico City Nairobi
New Delhi Shanghai Taipei Toronto
With offices in
Argentina Austria Brazil Chile Czech Republic France Greece
Guatemala Hungary Italy Japan Poland Portugal Singapore
South Korea Switzerland Thailand Turkey Ukraine Vietnam
Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press
in the UK and in certain other countries
Published in the United States
by Oxford University Press Inc., New York

© Editorial material and arrangement Malcolm D. Evans 2010
Individual chapters—the several contributors 2010
The moral rights of the authors have been asserted Crown copyright material is reproduced with the permission of the Controller, HMSO (under the terms of the Click Use licence).
Database right Oxford University Press (maker)

First published 2003
This edition 2010

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means,
without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press,
or as expressly permitted by law, or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department,
Oxford University Press, at the address above
You must not circulate this book in any other binding or cover
and you must impose the same condition on any acquirer

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Data available
Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
International law / edited by Malcolm D. Evans.—3rd ed.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-0-19-956566-5 (pbk.)
1. International law. I. Evans, Malcolm D. (Malcolm David), 1959-
KZ1242.I573 2010
341—dc22 2010014851
Typeset by Newgen Imaging Systems (P) Ltd., Chennai, India
Printed in Great Britain
on acid-free paper by
Ashford Colour Press Ltd, Gosport, Hampshire
ISBN 978-0-19-956566-5
1 3 5 7 9 10 8 6 4 2

3210

PA
1 A SHORT HISTO
Stephen C Neff
2 WHAT IS INTER
Martti Koskenni
3 WICKED HERES THEORY AND IN Iain Scobbie
PART
4 THE SOURCES O
Hugh Thirlway
5 SOFT LAW IN IN Alan Boyle
6 INTERNATIONAL
Dinah Shelton
7 THE PRACTICAL
Malgosia Fitzmau
PART I
8 STATEHOOD, SEI
Matthew Craven

5837

The Court here rules that conduct inconsistent with an existing rule is not necessarily an indication of the recognition, or even the emergence, of a new rule; but it does at the same time recognize that this is a way in which a new rule may be discerned. Later in the same decision, discussing the principle of non-intervention, it observed that 'Reliance by a State on a novel right or an unprecedented exception to the principle might, if shared in principle by other States, tend toward a modification of customary international law'.[27] The paradox of opinio juris is of course here emphasized: if a State decides to act in a way inconsistent with a recognized rule of custom, it will no doubt have good and sufficient reason for doing so, and perhaps even for thinking that its approach should be generalized—that the rule needs to be modified consistently with its action. It will however, almost by definition, not be acting because it is convinced that there is already a new rule. The process by which customary rules change and develop thus presents theoretical difficulties; but it is a process which does occur. Customary law, in the traditional conception of it, is not a rigid and unchangeable system, though it is sometimes criticized as being such.

An important difference between customary law and law derived from treaties is that, as already observed, in principle customary law is applicable to all States without exception, while treaty-law is applicable as such only to the parties to the particular treaty. A State which relies in a dispute on a rule of treaty-law has to establish that the other party to the dispute is bound by the treaty; whereas if a claim is based on general customary law, it is sufficient to establish that the rule exists in customary law, and there is no need to show that the other party has accepted it, or participated in the practice from which the rule derives.[28] There are two exceptions to this principle: alongside general customary law there exist rules of special or local customary law, which are applicable only within a defined group of States; and it is in principle possible for a State which does not accept a rule which is in the process of becoming standard international practice to make clear its opposition to it, in which case it will be exempted from the rule when it does become a rule of law, having the status of what is generally called a persistent objector.

As regards local customary law, perhaps the only clear and well-known example is that relating to the practice of diplomatic asylum in Latin America, whereby the States of the region recognize the right of the embassies of other States of the region to give asylum to political fugitives.[29] The rule is purely local in that it is not asserted in favour of, or against, States outside the region: for example, neither the British Embassy in Buenos Aires, nor the Argentine Embassy in London, would be regarded as entitled to offer asylum. The International Court had to consider the detailed application of the rule in the Asylum and Haya de la Torre cases, in which Colombia relied, against Peru, on 'an alleged regional or local custom peculiar to Latin-American States'. In the Asylum case the Court observed that:

[27] Ibid, para 207.

[28] If the dispute is subjected to arbitration or judicial settlement, there is theoretically no need even to establish the existence of the rule; according to the principle jura novit curia (the court knows the law), no proof of general rules of law is required. However, in practice litigant States do endeavour to prove the existence of the rules of law on which they base their claims.

[29] Another alleged rule of regional customary law was pleaded in the Dispute regarding Navigational and Related Rights between Costa Rica and Nicaragua, but the ICJ found it unnecessary to decide whether such a rule existed: Judgment of 13 July 2009, paras 34–36.

3211

5838

THE HANDBOOK OF

COMPARATIVE CRIMINAL LAW

Edited by

KEVIN JON HELLER AND MARKUS D. DUBBER

3212

5839

Stanford University Press
Stanford, California

©2011 by the Board of Trustees of the Leland Stanford Junior University.
All rights reserved.

No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system without the prior written permission of Stanford University Press.

Printed in the United States of America on acid-free, archival-quality paper

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

The handbook of comparative criminal law / edited by Kevin Jon Heller and Markus D. Dubber.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-0-8047-5758-4 (cloth : alk. paper)
1. Criminal law. 2. Comparative law. I. Heller, Kevin Jon. II. Dubber, Markus Dirk.
K5015.4.H36 2011
345—dc22 2010020243

Typeset by Westchester Book Group in 10/13.5 Minion.

3213

5840

INDIA

Stanley Yeo

I. Introduction
  A. Historical Sketch
  B. Jurisdiction
  C. Legality Principle
  D. Sources of Criminal Law
  E. Process
II. General Part
  A. Theories of Punishment
  B. Liability Requirements
  C. Defences
  D. Justifications
  E. Excuses
  F. Sanctions
III. Special Part
  A. Structure
  B. Homicide
  C. Sex Offences
  D. Theft and Fraud
  E. "Victimless" Crimes
  F. Offences Involving Cruelty to Wives and Dowry Deaths
  G. Voluntary Active Euthanasia and Physician-Assisted Suicide

Stanley Yeo is Professor of Law at the National University of Singapore. His recent publications include (with Mark Findlay and Stephen Odgers) Australian Criminal Justice (Oxford, 4th ed., 2009) and (with Neil Morgan and Chan Wing Cheong) Criminal Law in Malaysia and Singapore (LexisNexis, 2007).

3214

5841

I. INTRODUCTION

A. Historical Sketch

The criminal law of India is governed principally by the Indian Penal Code of 1860 (hereinafter the Code). Before its advent the prevailing criminal law in India was a patchwork of Muslim and Hindu law. The Code's authors drew their inspiration from several sources, notably the English criminal law, the French Penal Code, and Edward Livingston's Code for Louisiana. When they were drafting the Code, they were very clear in their goal of making it exhaustive.

The Code's authors proposed a scheme whereby ambiguities or gaps in the Code were to be referred to Parliament, which should decide the point and, if necessary, amend the Code. Regrettably, this proposal was not adopted in India, so the courts have had to undertake the tasks of determining the meaning to be given to an ambiguous provision and filling a gap left by the Code.

Two points from legal history are worth noting because they provide useful background from which to consider the Code. The first is that English criminal law when the Code was drafted was in a state of chaos, and serious efforts at reforming the law were being made. Second, the Code's authors were heavily influenced by the individualistic libertarian philosophy of Jeremy Bentham. This philosophy imbued the Code with a utilitarian base and cast mens rea in largely subjective terms, in contrast to the prevailing retributionism and frequently objectively based mens rea of nineteenth-century English criminal law.

B. Jurisdiction

The Code specifies the extent of criminal jurisdiction over offences committed within and outside India. India's territory comprises its land, internal waters, territorial coastal waters, and airspace above its land and waters. Section 2 makes the Code applicable to every person irrespective of rank, caste, creed, or nationality. Section 108A also provides that a person who in India instigates the commission of an offence outside India is liable to be punished under the Code. Foreign nationals who commit a crime in India cannot plead ignorance of Indian law. It has also been held that a foreign national who in India instigates the commission of a crime outside India is also liable to punishment under the Code.[1]

Certain people are exempt from the criminal jurisdiction of the courts by virtue of the constitution of India, statutory provisions, or rules of international law. They include the president of India, the governor of an Indian state, Supreme Court and High Court judges, and foreign sovereigns and ambassadors.

Extraterritorial jurisdiction is afforded by section 3 of the Code, which stipulates that any person may be tried for an offence committed by him or her outside India provided he or she is liable to be punished for it by Indian law as if he or she had committed it within India. This section therefore postulates the trial of Indian citizens for crimes committed abroad even though their conduct may not be recognized as a crime in the place where it was committed.

3215

5842

Also, the section applies to foreigners who are covered by special laws bringing them under Indian jurisdiction.[2] Additionally, section 4 provides that the Code applies to any offence committed by any Indian citizen in any place outside India and to any person on any ship or aircraft registered in India, wherever it may be at the time of the offence.

There is no statute of limitations for the prosecution of offences mentioned in the Code. However, some offences created by special laws may be subject to a limitation period prescribed by those special laws.[3]

C. Legality Principle

Although the legislature has the power to enact both prospective and retrospective laws, those laws are subject to the maxim nulla poena sine lege (no punishment without law). This maxim is enshrined in article 20 of the constitution, which consists of two parts. The first proclaims that "no person shall be convicted of any offence except for a violation of law in force at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence." The second declares that no person shall "be subjected to a penalty greater than that which might have been inflicted under the law in force at the time of the commission of the offence." Hence, if a trial is held with respect to a law which came into force after the date when the offence was committed, article 20 requires the court to consider whether the penalty imposed is higher than the penalty which could have been imposed under the previous law.[4] Article 20 would not be infringed if the court imposed a penalty which was not greater than the one prescribed under the previous law.

These two constitutionally entrenched limitations do not prevent the legislature from enacting retrospective procedural laws. Consequently, the Supreme Court has held that a trial under a procedure different from that which obtained at the time of the commission of the offence is not in itself unconstitutional.[5]

D. Sources of Criminal Law

1. Legislature

The general principles of criminal liability and major offences are contained in the Code. There are also various statutes enacted by the central and state legislatures criminalizing conduct which may apply generally,[6] specially,[7] or locally.[8] A special law is applicable to the particular subject, while a local law applies to a particular part of India. The defences provided for in the Code are available to persons charged with an offence under special or local laws.[9]

2. Judiciary

The courts have an important role in interpreting the provisions of the Code and other penal statutes and applying them to the case at hand. Since the legislature has not been forthcoming in clarifying or resolving many ambiguities or gaps in the Code, this task has fallen on the courts. Moreover, the courts have often displayed ingenuity in interpreting Code provisions in ways which accommodate the social, cultural, and religious diversity of Indian society. It would therefore be correct to assert that the criminal law of India comprises statute law as interpreted and applied by a large body of case law which has been built up over time.

3216

5843

3. Executive

The executive cannot enact offences; that power belongs to the legislature. However, the legislature occasionally provides the executive with a range of powers to regulate activities which may be subjected to criminal sanction. For example, under special laws like the Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act 1967 and the Armed Forces (Special Powers) Act 1958, wide powers are conferred on the executive to declare an organization "unlawful" or an area a disturbed area. Similarly, the Police Act 1861 confers on the police wide powers of surveillance over persons whom the police have reasonable grounds to believe are leading a life of crime.

4. Scholars

Several voluminous and long-standing commentaries on the Code have been edited by distinguished Indian jurists and judges of higher courts.[40] They are occasionally referred to in judgments. Recent editions of these commentaries have tended toward becoming mere repositories of case summaries.

B. Process

1. Adversarial/Inquisitorial

The Indian criminal justice process has inherited and maintained the English adversarial model with its underlying premise that a person is presumed innocent until he or she is proved guilty. The judge's role is more than that of a mere umpire; he or she takes an active interest in the proceedings by putting questions to witnesses to ascertain the truth.[41] As the state's representative, the prosecution assists the trier of fact to arrive at the truth. In doing so, the prosecutor is disallowed from urging an argument which in his or her opinion does not carry weight, nor can he or she exclude legal evidence which supports the interests of the defendant. Counsel for the defence, if there is one, is required to do everything he or she ethically can to protect the interest of the defendant. Criminal proceedings are held in open court and may be reported in the press, and judgments are accessible to the public.

2. Jury/Written Opinions

Under colonial rule, the British administration introduced a jury system very much like the one operating in England at the time. However, the system did not work well, largely because it was difficult in such a diverse country as India to find sufficient numbers of people with similar status and backgrounds to sit in judgment of their peers. This resulted in a modification of the jury system which effectively overrode the jury verdict by vesting in the judge the power to set aside verdicts of acquittal by juries. Jury trials were eventually abolished by the legislature in 1960 on the ground that they were susceptible to media and public influence.

II. GENERAL PART

A. Theories of Punishment

None of the penal statutes, including the Code, expressly specify the theories of punishment. The Benthamite philosophy with its emphasis on utilitarianism has had a strong influence on the Code's approach to punishment. This is evident in the types of punishment which the Code recognized when it was first enacted, namely, the death penalty, transportation, imprisonment, whipping, and fines of sizable amounts. Likewise, the severe maximum penalties imposed for most offences in the Code attest to the view that the meting out and threat of punishment are essential for the control and prevention of crime.

3217

5844

Courts and commentators have suggested that the main theories of punishment are deterrence, retribution, and rehabilitation. The deterrent theory of punishment aims to deter the particular offender from reoffending and also to deter prospective offenders from committing the type of crime for which the offender was convicted.[12] The retributive theory views punishment as necessary to satiate the desire of crime victims and other members of society for vengeance. However, "[N]o sentence should ever appear to be vindictive [since] an excessive sentence defeats its own object and tends to further undermine respect for the law."[13] The rehabilitative theory of punishment seeks to make offenders harmless by curing them of those drawbacks which caused them to commit crime. Proponents of rehabilitation regard the punishment structure of the Code as brutal and harsh and a relic of former regressive times. They contend that in modern Indian society, sentencing should be seen as a process of reshaping a person who has degenerated into criminality. As a leading commentary has colorfully put it, "[A] therapeutic rather than an 'in terrorem' outlook should prevail in our criminal courts since brutal incarceration of the person merely produces laceration of his mind."[14]

Although these various theories of punishment may appear incompatible, they have in common the general aim of social defence. The Supreme Court endorsed this view when it dictated that the "sentence should bring home to the guilty party the consciousness that the offence committed by him was against his own interest and also against the interest of the society of which he happens to be a member."[15]

B. Liability Requirements

1. Objective/Actus Reus

i. Act

The word act is not defined in the Code. The courts have advised interpreting it in a commonsensical way by stating that "['act'] must necessarily be something short of a transaction which is composed of a series of acts . . . it means the action taken as a whole and not the numerous separate movements involved."[16]

There is a fundamental principle of criminal law which declares that, where the physical elements of the crime include conduct (whether an act or an omission), such conduct must be voluntary. This is implicit in all the offence-creating provisions of the Code. Where conduct is involuntary, the defendant cannot be held criminally liable for the crime charged. Voluntariness comprises the will or ability of the person to control his or her conduct.[17]

In cases where the defendant has performed a series of acts, it may be important to determine when the conduct element of the crime in question is concluded. This will be so in relation to mens rea crimes which require the defendant to have possessed the requisite mental element during the commission of the conduct element of the crime. For instance, if D has strangled V with the intention of killing him and, wrongly believing him to be dead, hangs V from a tree, is D liable for murder? This type of case raises the issue of the need for concurrence between the actus reus and the mens rea of a crime before D may be held liable. The courts have dealt with this issue by holding that D is liable if his or her subsequent act was morally congruent with his or earlier act.[18] Thus, in the example given, D would be liable for murder if his act of hanging V was prompted by D's desire to conceal his or her previous act of strangulation which was done with the requisite mens rea for that offence.

3218

5845

ii. Omission

The general rule is that criminal liability is attached to conduct comprising positive activity by the defendant, but not to his or her failure to act. However, the law recognizes exceptions to this general rule. Section 43 of the Code confines these exceptions to omissions which are "illegal," by which is meant "everything which is an offence or which is prohibited by law, or which furnishes a ground for a civil action." Briefly stated, "[A]n illegal omission would apply to omissions of everything which [a person] is legally bound to do."[19]

There are three types of circumstances described in section 43 which render omissions illegal for the purposes of criminal liability. The first is omissions which are expressly made offences by the Code or other penal statutes. The second circumstance envisaged by section 43 is where the omission was prohibited by law. What is "prohibited by law" certainly includes omissions which are expressly made offences, but the term is not restricted to these offences. For example, shipping legislation may impose a duty on a captain to provide medical treatment to sick persons on board. Although the legislation does not make a captain's failure to discharge this duty an offence, it does prohibit such failure, which would therefore constitute an illegal omission under section 43.[20]

The third circumstance requires a court to determine whether the particular defendant's omission would attract civil liability. Failures to act which furnish ground for a civil action are most commonly related to tort law, in particular, the tort of negligence. Like criminal law, tort law has a general rule imposing a legal duty of care in respect of positive activity which might harm others, and it imposes such a duty of care for omissions in exceptional situations. Civil law imposes a legal duty to act where a special relationship exists between the defendant and the person injured by the defendant's omission. Examples include the relationship between a parent and his or her young child, or when a person voluntarily assumes responsibility for a physically and mentally infirm adult who is incapable of looking after himself or herself. Civil law also imposes a duty of care in respect of omissions when the defendant has negligently created the dangerous situation. Besides tort law, a failure to act may furnish ground for a civil action based on contract law.

iii. Status

There are some offences which base criminal liability on the defendant's status, that is, relationship with a specified state of affairs, which may be a circumstance or an event. These offences are invariably created by statute and are relatively minor in nature. An example is provided in section 3 of the Public Gambling Act 1867 of being the occupier of any premises used as a common gaming house. The crime is established upon proof that the defendant was the occupier of the premises fitting the specified description, and there is no formal requirement of an act or omission by him or her. Furthermore, the defendant cannot escape liability on the ground of ignorance.

3219

5846

As in the case of omissions, criminal law is circumspect in imposing criminal liability based merely on status, for otherwise, freedom of individuals to be connected to a circumstance or an event would be greatly stifled. Such a form of liability is therefore limited to persons who have responsibility for, or are in control of, the proscribed situation. Thus, in the example just given, the statute creating the offence confines liability to the occupier of the premises used as a common gaming house and does not extend it to other occupants or visitors who have no control over the state of affairs of those premises.

2. Subjective/Mens Rea/Mental Element

i. Intent

The term intention is not defined in the Code, and the task of doing so is thus left to the courts. The Supreme Court has held that it comprises "a conscious state in which mental faculties are aroused into activity and summoned into action for the purpose of achieving a conceived end. It means shaping of one's conduct so as to bring about a certain event."[21] It is uncertain whether the meaning of intention extends beyond its purposive sense to include knowledge of the virtual certainty of an event occurring (sometimes described as "oblique" or "indirect" intention). Against such an extension is the fact that many Code offences include, besides intention, the mens rea of knowing the likelihood of the proscribed result. For these offences, oblique intention would more than satisfy this type of knowledge.

The courts have ruled that the concept of intention is distinguishable from desire. Desire introduces an emotional or motivational element that may or may not be present in intention. Similarly, intention is not to be confused with motive.[22] Motive is the emotional force behind the defendant's conduct and is distinguished from intention, which is a technical concept denoting a mental state in which the defendant acts with the purpose to bring about a result.

ii. Recklessness

Although the term reckless does not appear in the Code, this type of mens rea is expressed in other ways in the Code insofar as it denotes advertence to a risk. The most common expression of this nature in the Code is "knows to be likely" to cause a proscribed result, an instance of which is section 299(3) concerning the offence of culpable homicide. Another expression used by the Code is "rashness," which is the mens rea for the crime of causing death by a rash act under section 304A. This term has been judicially interpreted as "acting with the consciousness that mischievous and illegal consequences may follow, but with the hope that they will not and often with the belief that the actor has taken sufficient precautions to prevent their happening."[23] The difference between "rash" and "knows to be likely" is one of degree, with the former requiring only knowledge that the proscribed harm was possible, while the latter requires knowledge that a harm was probable.[24] Clearly, oblique intention will satisfy either of these forms of recklessness.

iii. Negligence

There are some offences in the Code which are based on negligence.[25] The Code does not define the term negligence, and it has been left to the courts to do so. It has been held that "[c]riminal negligence is the gross and culpable neglect or failure to exercise that reasonable and proper care and precaution to guard against injury . . . , which having regard to all the circumstances out of which the charge has arisen, it was the imperative duty of the defendant person to have adopted."[26] A gross degree of negligence is required before criminal liability will lie.[27]

3220

5847

The defendant's conduct is measured against what a reasonable person, judged according to the knowledge, experience, and skill expected of such a person, would have done in the same or similar circumstances as those of the defendant. The courts have been prepared to partially subjectivize this objective standard of care by taking into account the mental incapacity of a particular defendant which prevented him or her from appreciating the danger at the material time.[28]

Although the concept of "good faith" as used in the Code is not strictly a form of mens rea, it is closely related to that of negligence. Section 52 of the Code states that "[n]othing is said to be done or believed in good faith which is done or believed without due care and attention."

3. Theories of Liability

i. Inchoate Crimes

a. Attempt

The Code provisions on attempt comprise a general provision[29] coupled with specific provisions[30] for the punishment of attempt. All these provisions serve only to regulate the extent of punishment for an attempt and do not contain a definition of what constitutes an attempt. Consequently, the courts have had to pronounce on the elements of attempt.

In relation to the actus reus, the courts have applied several tests. One is that the defendant's conduct must have gone beyond the stage of preparation and have been sufficiently proximate to the substantive offence. However, this does not require such conduct to have been the last act which the defendant was capable of doing.[31] Another test is whether the defendant's conduct was such as to unequivocally indicate his or her intention to commit the offence.[32]

With respect to the mens rea, the courts have held that, insofar as the general provision on attempt is concerned, criminal liability requires nothing less than an intention by the defendant to commit the substantive offence.[33] The words appearing in the general provision, "Whoever attempts . . . to cause such an offence to be committed," make it possible to convict a person of attempting to abet, or attempting to conspire with, another person to commit an offence. This is because abetment and conspiracy are recognized as offences in their own right by the Code. Conviction for attempt will lie even if the person abetted or conspired with does not proceed to commit the substantive offence.

The courts have ruled that a person may be liable for attempt even if what he or she had set out to do was factually impossible to achieve.[34] Supporting this ruling are the illustrations accompanying section 511 of the Code, which show that a person may be guilty of attempting to steal from an empty receptacle.

b. Conspiracy

The Code defines the offence of criminal conspiracy as constituting an agreement by two or more persons to do or cause to be done an illegal act, or an act which is not illegal by illegal means.[35] Furthermore, where the agreement is not to commit an offence, an overt act done by one or more of the parties in pursuance of the agreement is required. The actus reus of criminal conspiracy is the agreement which involves a meeting of minds and unity of purpose between the conspirators.[36] There need not be a physical meeting of the parties, nor does a person have to be a party to the agreement from the start.[37] A person may be convicted of criminal conspiracy even though the other party involved is still at large, dead, unknown, or has been acquitted on a technical ground.[38] The Code does not explicitly exclude agreements between spouses or with the intended victim of the offence from the scope of criminal conspiracy.

3221

5848

The mens rea of criminal conspiracy consists of an intention by the parties to carry out the object of the agreement. Such an intention is absent from a party who merely pretends to join a criminal conspiracy but does not share the object of the scheme. Each party to the agreement is not required to know all the details of the scheme.[39]

People may be liable for criminal conspiracy whose object was factually impossible to achieve, provided the agreement was to commit an offence. Thus, in one case, two men who had agreed with each other to kill their intended victim by witchcraft were held liable for criminal conspiracy to commit murder, since they had agreed to commit murder and not merely to perform acts of witchcraft.[40]

ii. Complicity

The Code contains a number of provisions dealing with complicity, which is described as "abetment." The main provision is section 107, which provides for three types of abetment: by instigation, by conspiracy, and by intentional aiding. Abetment is recognized as an offence in its own right and, subject to one qualification, is not dependent on the person abetted committing the substantive offence.[41] The courts have held that this is true for cases of abetment by instigation and abetment by conspiracy. The qualification is that, for abetment by aiding, the person abetted must be proved to have committed the offence since the word aid suggests that the act aided was committed.[42] The Code recognizes a double inchoate crime by stipulating that "[t]he abetment of an offence being an offence, the abetment of such an abetment is also an offence."[43]

Regarding the actus reus, abetment by instigation requires the defendant to have actively suggested or stimulated the commission of the substantive offence.[44] As for abetment by conspiracy, the abettor must have engaged with one or more persons in a conspiracy, the conspiracy must be for the doing of the act abetted, and an act or illegal omission must have taken place in pursuance of the conspiracy and in order to the doing of the act abetted. A person cannot be convicted of abetment by conspiracy if the charges against all the other alleged conspirators have failed.[45] Regarding abetment by aiding, "aid" involves facilitating the commission of the act[46] and, therefore, must have been given before or at the time of the commission of the act. It has been held that mere presence at or near the scene of the crime does not itself amount to abetment by aiding.[47]

In relation to the mens rea, the general position is that the defendant must have intended that the person abetted carry out the conduct abetted, and must have known that such conduct amounted to a crime.[48] The law does not require the person abetted to have any guilty intention or knowledge or even to be capable of committing the crime.[49]

3222

5849

The Code has provisions dealing with cases where the person abetted committed an offence which differed from that intended by the abettor. Section 111 provides that when an act was abetted but a "different act" was done, the abettor is liable for that act provided it was "a probable consequence of the abetment and was committed under the influence of the instigation, or with the aid or in pursuance of the conspiracy which constituted the abetment." Section 113 provides that when the act abetted causes a "different effect" than that which was intended by the abettor, the abettor is liable for the effect caused, provided he or she "knew that the act abetted was likely to cause that effect." It has been observed that the test for criminal liability under section 111 is objective, while that under section 113 is subjective.

The Code also specifies the law in relation to joint criminal liability. The main provision is section 34, which states that "[w]hen a criminal act is done by several persons, in furtherance of the common intention of all, each of such persons is liable for that act in the same manner as if the act were done by him alone." The offence for which the secondary offender may be liable on the basis of section 34 is that which was committed by the principal offender; they cannot be liable for different offences. Participation in some form or other in the criminal act constitutes the main feature of section 34. For participation to be made out, the defendant must have been physically or constructively present when the offence occurred.[50]

The term common intention in section 34 refers to the common design of two or more persons acting together and signifies the reason for doing the acts collectively forming the "criminal act."[51] The phrase "in furtherance of a common intention" contained in this section enables criminal liability for collateral offences to be imputed to persons acting in concert even though those offences may not have formed part of the common design. Case authorities recognize three situations when this could occur. The first is the act which was intended by all the parties;[52] the second is the act which, though not intended, was known by the parties to be a possible consequence of the criminal enterprise; and the third is the act which any one of the parties commits "in order to avoid or remove any obstruction or resistance put up in the way of the proper execution of the common intention."[53]

iii. Corporate Criminal Liability

In spite of its antiquity, the Code does criminalize and punish corporations for offences having a mens rea element. For example, a corporation can be liable for certain offences of personal violence, including culpable homicide, by virtue of the particular definitions given to these offences, read with section 11 of the Code. That section provides that the word person appearing in the Code includes a company, association, or body of persons, whether incorporated or not. However, other offences such as rape and perjury are excluded because the wording of these offences shows that they can be committed only by a natural person.[54]

A difficulty arises in establishing the mens rea element of an offence where a corporate entity is involved. Since the Code is silent on this issue, the courts have adopted the doctrine of identification developed by English common law.[55] Under this doctrine, a corporation will be held criminally liable if its "directing mind" (which could be an individual person or the board of directors of the corporation) possessed the requisite mens rea.[56] Where individuals are concerned, they have to be sufficiently high up in the organizational hierarchy of the corporation to satisfy this test.[57]

3223

5850

Since a corporation is a fictitious entity, it is incapable of receiving bodily punishments such as imprisonment. Consequently, a corporation can be prosecuted for offences which are punishable only by a fine.[58] There is also case authority holding that corporations may be prosecuted for offences where a fine and imprisonment term are mandatory, in which case it would be punished only by a fine.[59]

4. Causation

The authors of the Code considered prescribing general rules on causation but eventually decided that the infinite variety of cases made the rules a matter for the courts to develop. Although the Code's authors chose not to devise general principles on causation, they thought it necessary to include specific provisions on causation in respect of the offence of culpable homicide. The relevant provisions appear as explanations to section 299 (the section on culpable homicide) and read as follows:

> Explanation 1
> A person who causes bodily injury to another who is labouring under a disorder, disease, or bodily infirmity, and thereby accelerates the death of that other, shall be deemed to have caused his death.
>
> Explanation 2
> Where death is caused by bodily injury, the person who causes such bodily injury shall be deemed to have caused the death, although by resorting to proper remedies and skilful treatment the death might have been prevented.

The courts have generally applied a two-stage inquiry to the issue of causation.[60] The first stage involves inquiring whether the defendant caused the proscribed result in fact. This is resolved by applying the "but-for" test, which, if met, shows that the defendant's conduct was a causa sine qua non (a necessary or indispensable condition) of the victim's harm. The second stage involves inquiring whether the defendant's conduct had caused the victim's harm as a matter of law (a causa causans). This involves a value judgment whether the defendant was sufficiently blameworthy for causing the harm to warrant conviction and punishment. The courts have occasionally applied the test of "a substantial cause" in relatively straightforward cases of causation. However, the judicial preference appears to be for a test of reasonable foresight by the defendant of the harm. For example, it was held in a murder case that "any act is said to cause death . . . when the death results either from the act itself or from some consequences necessarily or naturally flowing from that act, and reasonably contemplated as its result."[61]

In many cases the defendant's conduct would have been the primary or even sole cause of the proscribed result. However, there will be other cases where a subsequent causal act or event occurs (a novus actus interveniens), thereby raising the question whether the defendant's conduct continued to play a causal role or merely formed part of the factual background. The Indian courts have, in many cases, used the reasonable-foresight test to resolve these more complicated cases of causation.[62]

3224

5851

C. Defences

1. Types of Defence

The principal defences are contained in the Code. They consist of the "general exceptions" contained in part IV[63] of the Code, which apply to offences found within[64] the Code, as well as without,[65] unless excluded by statute. In addition, there are the "special exceptions" to murder as spelled out in section 300 of the Code. These various exculpatory defences can be categorized into three types. The first denies personal responsibility for what occurred, such as the defences of mistake of fact and accident. The second type is where the offence elements are proved, but the broader context in which the conduct transpired offers a justification or excuse which negates criminal liability. Examples of justificatory defences are consent, self-defence, necessity (choice of evils), and superior orders. Excusatory defences include duress, mistake, and provocation. The third type of exculpatory defences has mental impairment as its core. Although evidence of mental impairment may be used to deny an offence element such as knowledge or intent, such evidence can support an independent defence. For example, mental impairment can prevent a person from having the capacity to judge the rightness or wrongness of his or her conduct or can affect his or her capacity to control conduct. Examples include the defences of unsoundness of mind, intoxication, and infanticide.

2. Burden of Proof

There are a number of broad principles which are applicable to all criminal trials. The first is that it is the responsibility of the prosecution to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. If it fails to do so, the defendant is entitled to be acquitted on the basis that he or she is presumed innocent of the crime charged unless proved otherwise. Once the prosecution has proved beyond a reasonable doubt facts which, if unanswered, would establish the charge against the defendant, it is the responsibility of the defendant who seeks to be exculpated to adduce evidence in support of one of the legally recognized defences. The court decides on the case after taking into consideration the evidence as a whole.

The Indian Evidence Act 1872 contains two provisions which endorse these broad principles. The first is section 101, the relevant parts of which provide that "[w]hoever desires any court to give judgment as to any legal right or liability, dependent on the existence of facts which he asserts, must prove that those facts exist," and that "[w]hen a person is bound to prove the existence of any fact, it is said that the burden of proof lies on that person." This section clearly provides that in a criminal trial the legal burden of proving that the defendant is guilty of the crime charged lies throughout with the prosecution.

The second provision is section 105, which stipulates that the defendant bears the burden of proving a full or partial defence. The Supreme Court has interpreted this provision to mean that the defendant bears the burden, as in a civil case, of raising some evidence in support of a defence.[66] In other words, the court will presume the absence of circumstances which bring the case under one of the recognized defences, and it will cast the burden on the defendant to rebut this presumption by adducing evidence showing that the preponderance of probabilities is in favor of his or her plea. Should this occur, the prosecution has to rebut the evidence supporting a defence beyond a reasonable doubt, in keeping with the prosecution's obligation to discharge the legal burden of proof that the defendant is guilty of the crime as charged.

3225

5852

D. Justifications

1. Necessity

Section 81 of the Code recognizes a defence of necessity which is available to all offences, including murder. The requirements of the defence are contained in the rather sparsely worded section and the explanation and illustrations accompanying it.

Although no mention is made of a requirement of proportionality, this is evidenced by the illustrations. Illustration (a) is of a ship captain who chooses to run the risk of running down a boat with two passengers on board in order to avoid inevitably colliding with a boat holding thirty passengers. The illustration declares that the captain is not guilty of any offence if he runs down the first boat, provided he satisfies all the requirements of section 81. The "choice-of-evils" doctrine is apparent here, with the defendant justified in risking the lives of a few to save many. To the same effect, illustration (b) is of a defendant who pulls down houses in order to stop a great fire from spreading and causing loss of human life and property.

Besides the requirement of proportionate response, section 81 requires the defendant to have lacked any "criminal intention" to cause the harm. The meaning of this provision is unclear. It is likely to refer to the defendant's objective in committing the proscribed conduct; if the objective was to prevent other harm, the defendant's intention would not have been "criminal." Another requirement is that the defendant must have incurred the risk "in good faith" (i.e., "with due care and attention") for the purpose of preventing or avoiding "imminent"[67] harm. This may be contrasted with the more demanding test of "instant" harm for the closely related defence of duress.[68] It has also been noted that section 81 does not specify the types of threatened harms, leaving them open ended. Third, the defendant must have been "without any fault or negligence"[69] in creating the circumstances of necessity.

2. Self-Defence

The provisions dealing with the defence of person and of property are spelled out in great detail in the Code.[70] Two preconditions have to be met before the right of self-defence arises. The first is that an offence affecting the human body or property was being committed against the defendant or some other person.[71] A supplementary provision specifies circumstances when the law will recognize the right of self-defence even though the act confronting the defendant was not an offence. These circumstances include the aggressor's youth, want of maturity of understanding, unsoundness of mind, intoxication, and mistake of fact.[72] The second precondition is that there must not have been time for the defendant or person threatened to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities.[73]

3226

5853

If the preconditions are met, there are certain other requirements that have to be satisfied for the defence to succeed. One requirement is that the defendant must have reasonably apprehended the particular danger which he or she claims compelled him or her to take defensive action. In relation to defence of the person, the Code expressly provides that the right to self-defence extends to the causing of death if the defendant reasonably apprehended a threat of death or grievous hurt or, in the case of an assault for the purpose of wrongful confinement, reasonably apprehended that he or she would be unable to have recourse to the public authorities for his or her release.[74] With regard to defence of property, fatal force may be used against certain specified threats, such as where the defendant reasonably apprehended death or grievous hurt to be a consequence of theft, mischief, or house trespass.[75] The duration of the right of self-defence is commensurate with the duration of the danger as reasonably apprehended by the defendant.[76]

A further requirement of self-defence is that the defendant must not have inflicted "more harm than it is necessary to inflict for the purpose of defence."[77] When dealing with this requirement, the courts have held that the force used by the defendant "should not be weighed in golden scales."[78] A person need not wait till the attack has commenced to exercise his or her right of self-defence. Depending on the circumstances, such a preemptive strike could satisfy the requirement of necessary harm.[79] There is also no legal duty to retreat; although having an opportunity to retreat may tell against the defendant in respect of satisfying the requirement of necessary harm, it is not conclusive about that requirement.

3. Consent

The Code devotes several sections to outlining different sets of circumstances when consent would be a full defence.[80] The term consent is not defined in the Code. The courts have held that for consent to be valid, the giver must have fully understood the nature and consequences of the conduct consented to, and that mere submission or passivity is not consent.[81] Furthermore, section 90 provides that consent is vitiated if it was given by a person under fear of injury or under a misconception of fact, or of unsound mind or intoxicated so as not to understand what he or she consented to, or who was under twelve years of age. The Code adopts the individualistic libertarian stance that the criminal law should intervene only where there was harm to others. Accordingly, where a "victim" consents to harm and no other person is hurt, the criminal law should not intervene, whether on moral, paternalistic, or utilitarian grounds.

The main provisions of the defence of consent are sections 87 and 88. Section 87 embraces most fully the individualistic libertarian philosophy concerning consensual harm. It provides that so long as the consenting party was above eighteen years of age, the doer is not criminally responsible for the harm consented to which the doer intentionally caused or knew he or she was likely to cause to the consenting party. There is no requirement that the harm-causing act have been beneficial in some way to the consenting party. The only restriction imposed by section 87 is that the doer must not have intended or known that death or grievous hurt would be caused.

The other main provision, section 88, differs materially from section 87 in several important respects. First, section 88 applies so long as the consenting party is twelve years of age or above,[82] whereas section 87 imposes the eighteen-year age restriction. Additionally, the doer under section 88 can intentionally or knowingly cause harm short of death. The explanation for this wider scope of section 88 is due to yet another difference between them, which is that under section 88, the act causing the harm must have been done for the benefit of the consenting party. The Code does not define the meaning of the term benefit other than that it excludes "mere pecuniary benefit."[83] The individualistic libertarian premise of the defence lets the doer and consenting party decide whether the harm-causing act had been done for the consenting party's benefit. However, the doer of the harm-causing act must have "in good faith" (i.e., with "due care and attention") intended the consenting party to benefit from that act.

3227

5854

4. Superior Orders

The defence of superior orders is recognized under section 76 of the Code, the relevant part of which reads: "Nothing is an offence which is done by a person who is . . . bound by law to do it." One of the accompanying illustrations is of a soldier who, in conformity with the law, obeys the order of his superior officer to fire at a mob. The soldier commits no offence by virtue of this provision. For these types of cases, it is immaterial whether the defendant believed that the order was lawful.[84] Such a belief is relevant only where the superior's order was found to have been unlawful, in which event the case will attract the excusatory defence, to be described in section II.E.6 in this chapter, that the subordinate mistakenly believed as a matter of fact that he or she was bound by law to obey the order.

Civil legislation will generally dictate what orders can be lawfully issued by a superior officer. During states of emergency or a period of martial law, the duties and attendant extraordinary powers exercised by police or military personnel will have received the endorsement of the civil law. Accordingly, an order which is authorized by the emergency legislation or martial law will be lawful for the purposes of the defence of superior orders.

A member of the police or armed forces should refuse to obey an order which he or she knows would result in a breach of the criminal law, even if such refusal may render him or her subject to military discipline. The judicial explanation for this stance is that "military discipline, while it regulates the conduct of a soldier in military matters, is made subject to a higher law in favor of public safety, when the act which the military discipline attempts to enforce or to justify is one which affects the person or property of another."[85]

E. Excuses

1. Mistake/Ignorance of Law or Fact

The primary Code provision on mistake is section 79, which concerns a person who, under a mistake of fact, believes that he or she was justified by law in committing an offence. The expression justified by law requires only that the actor's conduct have been lawful, while the term law denotes the general municipal law of the land. Section 79 expressly declares that mistake of law is not a defence. It imposes a blanket rule preventing mistakes of law from operating as a defence to a criminal charge. The strictness of this exclusionary rule is exemplified by a judicial ruling that a person who had accepted the decision of a court as a guide to his or her conduct was liable for a technical offence if that decision had subsequently been held not to express the correct law.[86] Mistake of law is, however, recognized as a mitigating factor in sentencing.[87]

3228

5855

The term mistake is not defined in the Code. It has been suggested that a mistake of fact consists of "an unconsciousness, ignorance, or forgetfulness of a fact, past or present, material to the transaction, or in the belief of the present existence of a thing material to the transaction, which does not exist, or in the past existence of a thing which has not existed."[88] Section 79 requires that the defendant's mistake pertain to a factual matter, as opposed to a legal one. A mistake of mixed fact and law has been treated by the courts as a mistake of fact for the purposes of these provisions.[89]

Section 79 requires the defendant to have "in good faith" (i.e., with "due care and attention") believed himself or herself to be bound or justified by law in doing a criminal act. The element "in good faith" under section 79 relates to the defendant's perception of the factual circumstances rather than to his or her performance of the criminal act. Furthermore, that perception must have led the defendant to believe that he or she was justified by law in doing the thing complained of. Certainly a defendant's careful performance of conduct would often support his or her belief that he or she was justified by law in doing it. But the inquiry into "in good faith" under section 79 does not stop at the defendant's conduct but proceeds from there to consider his or her belief. Although the concept "in good faith" is appraised objectively, account will be taken of certain personal characteristics of the defendant, together with the particular circumstances he or she experienced.[90]

2. Insanity/Diminished Capacity

The defence of insanity or diminished capacity, known as "unsoundness of mind," is contained in section 84 of the Code. It has been modeled after the principal rule pronounced in M'Naghten's Case,[91] the leading English common law authority on the defence of insanity. The Code does not define the term unsoundness of mind contained in section 84, and the courts have not elaborated upon it. The suggestion has been made that the term is wider than "disease of the mind" under the M'Naghten rules. Although unsoundness of mind is a legal term with a clinical component, it is finally the responsibility of the court to determine its application in any particular case.

A person is not exempt from criminal liability simply because he or she was of unsound mind at the time of the alleged offence. It must be shown that the unsoundness of mind was of a kind and severity which rendered the defendant "incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that he is doing what is either wrong or contrary to law."

The meaning of "nature of an act" is not elaborated in section 84. The courts have interpreted the expression as signifying the mental impairment of either the surface features of the act (such as cutting a person's throat believing it to be a loaf of bread) or the harmful consequences to the victim (such as causing his or her death). Under this interpretation, a defendant who was capable of knowing the surface features of his or her act but was too mentally disordered to be capable of knowing the harmful consequences of that act would be covered by the section 84 defence.

It has been held that the word wrong appearing in the phrase "either wrong or contrary to law" in section 84 refers to moral wrongness as opposed to legal wrongness (i.e., contrary to law).[92] The defence will apply where the defendant knew that his or her act was contrary to law but thought that it was morally right to do the act, and vice versa.[93]

3229

5856

3. Intoxication

The defence of intoxication is very narrowly circumscribed under section 85 of the Code. For the defence to succeed, the intoxication must have been involuntary; the relevant words of the provision state that "the thing which intoxicated him was administered to him without his knowledge or against his will." The defence is therefore limited to cases where the defendant was mistaken about the nature of the drink or drugs, or else the defendant's drink or medication was spiked or had been forced on him or her.

Even if this was the case, the defendant must go on to prove that his or her intoxicated condition was so severe as to have incapacitated his or her cognitive faculties in the same way and degree as that required for the defence of unsoundness of mind (i.e., insanity). The relevant part of section 85 states that "[n]othing is an offence which is done by a person who, at the time of doing it, is, by reason of intoxication, incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is either wrong, or contrary to law." Since the form of incapacity is the same for both the defences of intoxication and unsoundness of mind, what distinguishes them is the cause of the incapacity. In respect of intoxication, it is drink or drugs, whose effect is transient by nature, compared with the cause of unsoundness of mind, which is of a longer-lasting nature.

Section 86 of the Code provides that in cases of voluntary intoxication, the same liability may be imposed on the defendant as could be imposed on a sober person who may have the knowledge to foresee the consequences of his or her conduct. With regard to crimes whose mens rea consists of an intention by the defendant to achieve the consequences of his or her conduct, voluntary intoxication could be a defence if the degree of intoxication was so severe as to negate that intention.[94]

4. Duress

The Code provides for the defence of duress under section 94, but murder and offences against the state punishable by death are excluded from its scope of operation. Section 94 unequivocally specifies that nothing short of a threat of instant death to the defendant will suffice. Thus the defence will be unavailable in cases where the threat was of some lesser harm, was not immediate, or was directed at a third party.

Another requirement of the defence is that the threat must have "reasonably cause[d] the apprehension" of instant death, so that it is not simply the defendant's belief but what he or she reasonably believed to be the nature of the threat. There is also a proviso in section 94 which requires that the defendant "did not of his own accord . . . place himself in the situation by which he became the subject" of the threat. The example given in the Code is that of a person who voluntarily joins a gang of robbers with knowledge of their character. He is not entitled to the benefit of the defence should he subsequently be compelled by his associates to do anything which is an offence. The wording of the proviso is also capable of being interpreted so as to require the defendant to have taken a reasonable opportunity to escape from his or her threatener.

3230

5857

5. Entrapment

The Code does not have a provision recognizing entrapment as a defence, and the courts have refused to do so, treating the issue as an evidentiary matter. The courts have drawn a distinction between so-called legitimate and illegitimate traps. The former consists of cases where the offence was going to be committed in any event, and the trap was laid in order for the offence to be detected. The latter involves cases where there was no thought of committing an offence, and a temptation was offered to see if an offence would be committed in succumbing to it.

In respect of a legitimate trap, the law-enforcement officer taking part in the trap and witnesses to the trap are not accomplices in any sense, and their evidence will not require corroboration, although prudence will require that the evidence be carefully scrutinized and accepted as true before a conviction can be secured.[95] With regard to an illegitimate trap, the evidence obtained will be admissible only if it is corroborated. Furthermore, the persons participating in the trap will be guilty of an offence unless such entrapment was authorized by the legislature.[96]

6. Superior Orders

The Code recognizes that there may be instances where a subordinate mistakenly believed that he or she was bound by law to obey an order which turned out to be unlawful. This recognition is afforded by section 76, the relevant part of which states that "[n]othing is an offence which is done by a person . . . who by reason of a mistake of fact and not by reason of a mistake of law in good faith believes himself to be bound by law to do it." Where the subordinate knew that the order was unlawful, he or she is prevented from pleading section 76.

This defence comes into play only where the subordinate did not know that the order was unlawful. It is crucial to determine just what the subordinate did not know concerning the legality of the order. If the subordinate thought that the superior officer had legal authority to make the order when he or she did not, this is a mistake of law and therefore falls outside the operation of section 76. It is only where the subordinate mistakenly believed that the factual circumstances warranted giving the order and that he or she was therefore bound to obey it that the defence under section 76 is applicable. The defendant will be acquitted of any offence if he or she had "in good faith" (i.e., with "due care and attention") believed that the circumstances were such as to make the order lawful.[97] Although some judgments have described unlawful orders attracting section 76 as being "manifestly unlawful,"[98] this concept should not be regarded separately from the wording and tenor of section 76 with its focus on the reasonableness of the subordinate's mistake concerning the lawfulness of the order.

F. Sanctions

1. Punishment

As noted in section II.A, the strong utilitarian underpinnings of the Code gave no room for the theory of rehabilitation. In recent times there has been a move to humanize punishment by considering not only the criminal conduct but the offender as a person. Some results of this shift are the abolition of whipping as a type of punishment on account of its brutality, and the introduction of probation as an alternative to imprisonment.

3231

5858

There are five types of punishment available: the death penalty, life imprisonment, imprisonment, forfeiture, and fine. The death penalty is discussed in section II.F.3. Life imprisonment means rigorous (as opposed to simple) imprisonment for the remainder of an offender's life. Although the executive is empowered to commute the sentence, an embargo is imposed on the lifer to serve at least fourteen years of imprisonment.[99] There are two kinds of imprisonment, rigorous and simple. An offender sentenced to rigorous imprisonment is required to perform hard labor, such as digging earth and grinding corn, whereas one who is undergoing simple imprisonment does not have to do any kind of work. A court which imposes a sentence of imprisonment is required to state its reasons for not extending the benefit of probation to the offender.[100]

The punishment of forfeiture used to be available for quite a number of offences but is now confined to three offences in which the offender has to give up specific property. They are depredations on the territories of any power in alliance or at peace with the government of India (s. 126), knowingly receiving property taken by war or depredations under section 126 (s. 127), and a public servant unlawfully buying property which the public servant by virtue of his or her office is prohibited from buying (s. 169). Fines are forfeitures of a sum of money by way of penalty. They may be imposed as the sole punishment, as an alternative punishment, or as an additional punishment.

2. Quantity/Quality of Punishment

The sentencing decision is generally left entirely to the discretion of the judge. In deciding the appropriate punishment, the judge will consider the nature and magnitude of the offence, as well as the need for the penalty to be proportionate to the offence.[101]

Judges are empowered to impose concurrent or consecutive sentences and are inclined to have sentences run concurrently where the ends of justice are met. There are also statutory provisions which limit the amount of punishment. For example, section 71 of the Code protects an offender against multiplicity of punishment by providing that where he or she intended to commit an offence the commission of which involved perpetration of acts which are themselves punishable, the offender shall not be punished for them separately.

Except for a few offences, only the maximum punishments are prescribed for offences; the rationale is that the imposition of minimum punishments unduly restrains the sentencing judge from tailoring the penalty to fit the offender. The practice of the courts has been to impose the maximum punishment, whether of imprisonment or a fine, only in extreme cases.

The Code does not distinguish between positive activity and an omission in specifying the penalty to be imposed on an offender. Persons convicted of abetment are liable for the same penalty as that prescribed for the substantive offence.[102] Those convicted of attempt are generally liable for up to one-half the maximum term of imprisonment provided for the complete offence.[103]

Life imprisonment aside, the maximum term of imprisonment that a court can impose is fourteen years,[104] and the lowest term actually provided for a given offence is twenty four hours. The judge has discretion to impose either rigorous or simple imprisonment unless otherwise directed by the law. Some offences, such as armed robbery or attempting such robbery, attract a minimum term of imprisonment. The amount of a fine may be limited or unlimited, depending on the offence. Some provisions specify that the convict "shall be punished with imprisonment and shall also be liable to fine." This has been judicially interpreted to mean that a sentence of imprisonment must be imposed, but that the court has discretion whether to add a fine.[105]

3232

5859

3. Death Penalty

The death penalty may be imposed for a small number of offences—murder, robbery accompanied by murder, attempted murder by a person serving a life sentence if hurt is caused, waging war against the government of India, abetting mutiny actually committed, and giving false evidence upon which an innocent person suffers death.

The courts have upheld the constitutionality of the death penalty and have affirmed the view that hanging by the neck until death ensues is scientific and one of the least painful methods of execution.[106] Furthermore, they have striven to confine the imposition of the death penalty to the gravest cases of extreme culpability. In particular, the Supreme Court has declared that life imprisonment is the rule and the death penalty the exception and that any mitigating factors should be given their full weight.[107]

III. SPECIAL PART

A. Structure

The Code has chapters which classify offences according to the interests protected, namely, those of the state, the state apparatus, the public, the person, and property. Offences against the state aim to prevent the state's legal authority from being undermined. They include treasonable offences and seditious conduct causing hatred, contempt, or disaffection toward the state. Offences against the state apparatus protect the processes of justice and prohibit the corruption of public servants. Examples are obstructing public servants in the discharge of their duties, fabricating false evidence, and bribing a public servant. The use of criminal sanctions to protect the state and the state apparatus seeks to preserve the security of the social order.

Offences against the public seek to maintain public tranquility, public health, and public morals. Examples are unlawful assembly, rioting, affray, promoting disharmony between racial or religious groups, selling adulterated food, spreading infectious diseases, and the sale, publication, or distribution of obscene materials with a view to corrupting the morals of susceptible persons.

Offences against the person and property aim to protect the human body and the proprietary interests of individuals. Examples of offences against the person are culpable homicide, causing hurt, rape, criminal force, endangering human life or personal safety, and wrongful confinement. Offences against property include theft, cheating, criminal breach of trust, extortion, robbery, criminal trespass, housebreaking, and receiving stolen property.

3233

5860

B. Homicide

1. Murder/Manslaughter

The Code uses the term culpable homicide to describe killings involving a very high degree of culpability. There are two types of culpable homicide: murder and culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The Code commences with a definition of culpable homicide (s. 299), which is followed by a definition of murder (s. 300). Under this structure, culpable homicide not amounting to murder is what is left of section 299 which does not overlap with murder. The various types of mens rea for murder and culpable homicide not amounting to murder can be categorized as intention-based and knowledge-based. These types of mens rea fit into a structure where the degrees of fault are carefully graded in comparison with one another.

In relation to intention-based mens rea, the Code structure places at the apex the paradigm mental element of murder, that of an intention to cause death (s. 300(1)). Below this is an intention to cause such bodily injury as the offender knows to be likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm is caused (s. 300(2)). This comes very close to the paradigm mental element for murder, given that the offender intended the bodily harm knowing that it was likely to cause death. Consequently, he or she deserves to be convicted of murder. Next in order of degree of culpability is an intention to cause bodily injury to any person, where the injury intended is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death (s. 300(3)). This is a hybrid subjective/objective form of mens rea, with the offender intending to cause the bodily injury which is objectively appraised to "most probably"[108] cause death. Therefore, it is not as culpable as the offence in section 300(2) but nevertheless comes close to it and therefore warrants liability for murder. Where an offender intends to cause bodily injury which is objectively appraised to be "likely" (that is "probably" as opposed to "most probably") to cause death, he or she is regarded as not displaying the mens rea required for murder but for culpable homicide not amounting to murder (s. 299(2)).

With regard to knowledge-based mens rea, an offender who does an act knowing that it is so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death and who lacks any excuse for incurring the risk is regarded by the Code as displaying the fault for murder (s. 300(4)). Although knowledge is generally not in the same league as intention, knowledge of the virtual certainty[109] of causing death or bodily injury likely to cause death is comparable in degree of culpability with the forms of intentional murder under section 300(3). Where an offender does an act knowing that it is "likely" (i.e., "probable" as opposed to virtually certain) to cause death, this lesser degree of knowledge compared with section 300(4) warrants him or her being convicted of culpable homicide not amounting to murder (s. 299(3)). Where an offender has done an act knowing that it could possibly (as opposed to "be likely to/probably") cause death, he or she has not displayed the mens rea required for culpable homicide under the Code. Consequently, such an offender is guilty of the much less serious crime of causing death by a rash act (s. 304A).

Cases of negligent killings do not constitute culpable homicide but the much less serious offence of causing death by a negligent act under section 304A of the Code.[110] The mens rea for this offence consists of a gross departure from the standard of care expected of a reasonable person.[111]

3234

5861

A defendant charged with murder may seek to have his or her offence reduced to culpable homicide not amounting to murder by relying on one of the "special exceptions" (i.e., partial defences) to section 300. These exceptions are provocation,[112] exceeding the exercise of self-defence,[113] exceeding the exercise of legal powers,[114] sudden fight,[115] and consent.[116] Provocation is dealt with in section III.B.2 in this chapter. Exceeding self-defence is made out in two situations. The first is where the defendant honestly, albeit mistakenly and unreasonably, apprehended that the nature of the attack was of a type[117] against which the Code permitted the use of fatal force. The second situation is where the defendant honestly believed that the fatal force used was necessary when it was not. The Code is also prepared to partially excuse public servants who had exceeded their powers by using fatal force in circumstances which did not warrant their doing so. They would be liable for culpable homicide not amounting to murder if they believed in good faith that their act was lawful and necessary for the due discharge of their duty as a public servant, and without ill will toward the victim.

The partial defence to murder of sudden fight requires that the defendant have killed his or her victim in a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, without premeditation and without the defendant having taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner. With respect to consent, it was noted in section II.D.3 in this chapter that sections 87 and 88 of the Code expressly exclude cases where the doer intended his or her act to cause death to the consenting party or else knew that it was likely to cause death.[118] Exception 5 to section 300 of the Code provides that in such a case the defendant is liable only for culpable homicide not amounting to murder if the victim was above the age of eighteen years and had consented to suffer death or take the risk of death. This defence has been successfully pleaded by survivors of suicide pacts and in cases of mercy killings.

2. Provocation

Provocation is covered in exception 1 to section 300 of the Code and, if successfully pleaded, reduces the offence of murder to culpable homicide not amounting to murder. For the defence to succeed, the offender must have been deprived of his or her power of self-control as a result of grave and sudden provocation offered by the deceased, which caused the offender to kill the deceased. The provocation can constitute conduct or words, and there is case authority which recognizes hearsay provocation provided the defendant had reasonable grounds to believe that the provocation had actually occurred.[119] Furthermore, the provocation need not have been directed at the defendant but could have been aimed at someone else.[120]

Although the exception does not specify an objective test, the courts have read one into the exception by requiring that for the defence to succeed, "a reasonable man, belonging to the same class of society to which the defendant belongs, and placed in the situation in which the defendant was placed, would be so provoked as to lose his self-control."[121] On this basis, there have been cases which have held that a defendant's ethnic background can be taken into account when applying the objective test, both in relation to its effect on the gravity of the provocation and with regard to the power of self-control expected of the reasonable person.[122]

3235

5862

A proviso accompanying the exception disallows the defence where the provocation was "sought or voluntarily provoked by the offender as an excuse for killing or doing harm to any person." A second proviso renders the defence unavailable where the provocation consisted of conduct performed by a public servant in the lawful exercise of his or her powers, and a third does the same in respect of conduct involving the lawful exercise of the right of self-defence.

C. Sex Offences

The Code recognizes several sex offences, which can be categorized into those based on the victim's lack of consent and those where conduct is criminal irrespective of consent. The major offences under the first category are rape and assault with intent to outrage modesty. Those in the second category include carnal intercourse against the order of nature, incest, and sexual conduct involving children.

Rape occurs when a man penetrates a woman's vagina with his penis without her consent.[123] The offence is therefore gender specific and excludes penetration of other bodily orifices by the penis, as well as penetration of the vagina by another object. The Code does not define the term consent but assumes that its meaning is clear and then refers to circumstances when consent is vitiated.[124] The provision on rape supplements these circumstances by stipulating that the victim has not consented when the defendant has put her in fear of bodily injury, and also when the defendant knew that the victim had mistakenly believed him to be her husband.[125] The prosecution does not need to prove that the defendant knew that the victim was not consenting to sexual intercourse with him. Rather, it is for the defendant to contend that he lacked such knowledge by relying on the defence of mistake of fact provided for under the Code.[126] This requires the defendant to show that he had "in good faith" (i.e., with "due care and attention") believed that the victim had consented. Consequently, the defendant's belief must have been reasonable if it is to relieve him of liability. A husband can be convicted of raping his wife only if she was under fifteen years of age. The Code also makes it an offence for a husband to have sexual intercourse with his wife without her consent if she is living separately from him under a decree of separation.[127]

The offence of assaulting or using criminal force with intent to outrage the modesty of a woman can be committed by both men and women.[128] For the charge to be established, the prosecution must prove that the defendant used or threatened to use force on the victim without her consent, and that the defendant intended to outrage modesty or knew that his or her conduct was likely to outrage modesty. The Code does not define the meaning of the term modesty; the likely reason is that the concept can vary over time and depends on the context in which the conduct occurs. The Supreme Court has stated that "the quality of being modest in relation to women means 'womanly propriety of behavior, scrupulous chastity of thought, speech and conduct.'"[129] Because of the focus of the offence on the defendant's intention or knowledge, a person charged with outraging modesty could contend that he or she lacked the mens rea of the offence because he or she honestly (albeit unreasonably) believed that the victim had consented.[130]

3236

5863

The offence of carnal intercourse against the order of nature is committed when the defendant penetrates a person's anus or mouth with his penis.[131] It follows that the offence can be committed only by a male, although the "victim" can be either a male or a female. All such acts are covered by the offence, including those which were consensual and performed in private. If the act was consensual, the "victim" can be charged with abetting the offence.

D. Theft and Fraud

Theft is defined in section 378 of the Code as follows: "Whoever, intending to take dishonestly any movable property out of the possession of any person without that person's consent, moves that property in order to such taking is said to commit theft." The physical element of the offence is that the defendant must have moved (however slightly) the victim's movable property, and it is unnecessary for the property to have been removed from the victim's possession. The explanations accompanying section 378 show that movement can occur indirectly, such as where the defendant has caused an animal to move so that the item of the alleged theft is also moved, or where the defendant has removed obstacles to the subject matter's movement.[132] The Code defines "movable property" as "corporeal property of every description, except land and things attached to the earth, or permanently fastened to anything which is attached to the earth."[133] It has been observed that the offence of theft protects possessory rather than ownership interests. Consequently, a person can be held criminally liable for stealing his or her own property, provided that it can be proved that he or she acted dishonestly.

The mens rea of theft is that the defendant must have intended to take the property dishonestly out of the victim's possession without his or her consent. The Code defines "dishonestly" in terms of a person "intending to cause wrongful gain or wrongful loss."[134] "Wrongful gain" is in turn defined as "gain by unlawful means of property to which the person gaining is not legally entitled," and "wrongful loss" constitutes "loss by unlawful means of property to which the person losing it is legally entitled."[135] In particular, the courts have held that the concept of wrongful loss is broad enough to cover short-term as well as longer-term deprivations. It is unnecessary to prove any actual loss or gain—what is material is that the defendant intended to cause wrongful loss or gain. Accordingly, other forms of mens rea, such as knowledge, rashness, or negligence, will not suffice.

There is some judicial uncertainty whether the issue of consent forms part of the actus reus or mens rea elements of theft.[136] However, if one takes into account the syntax and punctuation in section 378, it is clear that lack of consent forms part of the mens rea. Accordingly, the issue is not whether the victim consented to the taking but whether the defendant intended to take without consent.

Cases of fraud are dealt with under the offence of cheating, which is provided for under section 415 of the Code. For the actus reus of cheating to be made out, the prosecution must prove that the defendant deceived the victim and thereby induced him or her (1) to deliver property to any person; (2) to consent to another person retaining property; or (3) to do or omit to do something which caused or was likely to cause damage or harm to that person in body, mind, reputation, or property. The mens rea for (1) and (2) is "fraudulently or "dishonestly," and for (3) it is "intentionally."

3237

5864

Unlike theft, cheating is not limited to movable property, nor is it an offence against possession or ownership; it relates simply to the delivery or retention of property. Deception and dishonesty are separate elements of the offence, so that it is incumbent on the prosecution to particularize the deception and not merely to allege dishonesty. An explanation accompanying section 415 states that a "dishonest concealment of facts" can constitute deception.

The meaning of "dishonestly" has been dealt with in the discussion of theft. "Fraudulently" is defined unhelpfully by the Code as follows: "A person is said to do a thing fraudulently if he does that thing with intent to defraud but not otherwise."[137] The courts have held that a person acts with intent to defraud if he or she intends that some person be deceived and that, through such deception, an advantage should accrue to him or her, or that injury, loss, or detriment should befall some other person.[138] Therefore, in contrast to dishonesty, fraudulence can exist even where there was no intention to cause any property gain or loss or a detriment that can be measured in financial terms. It appears to be sufficient that the defendant intended to cause some advantage or to imperil another person's interests in some way.

E. "Victimless" Crimes

Many of the common forms of victimless crimes are also found in India, such as the failure to wear seat belts in motor vehicles or crash helmets when riding motorcycles.[139] It is also an offence to engage in gambling other than the forms of gambling authorized by the state.[140] Another example is the use of prohibited drugs except for medical or scientific purposes.[141] Furthermore, homosexual intercourse between consenting adults is covered by the offence of "carnal intercourse against the order of nature" under the Code.[142] Although engaging in prostitution voluntarily is legal, it is an offence to solicit or loiter in or near public places.[143]

Other offences falling within the description of victimless crimes are those against public order and morals which, by their nature, may annoy or cause affront (as opposed to physical injury) to members of the public in general. One example is the offence of public nuisance, which is committed when a person "does any act which causes annoyance to the public,"[144] such as urinating in a public place. Another is the sale of obscene material, which is defined as "tend[ing] to deprave and corrupt persons who are likely to read, see or hear" the material.[145]

To these offences may be added specifically political offences recognized by the Code which are directed against the body politic, so that no individuals are injured as such. Examples are flag desecration, treason, abuse of political power which does not involve specific persons, and electoral fraud.

F. Offences Involving Cruelty to Wives and Dowry Deaths

The phenomenon of wives in northern Indian communities being killed by their husbands or in-laws, or committing suicide on account of their cruelty, has frequently caught the attention of both the national and the international media. The problem became so acute in the 1980s that legislation was enacted creating new offences and making their prosecution easier. Section 498A of the Code makes both physical and mental cruelty by husbands or their relatives for the purpose of obtaining the wife's dowry an offence punishable by three years' imprisonment and a fine. The offence has been designated as cognizable (arrestable without a warrant) and non-bailable to provide the wife immediate relief from such cruelty.

3238

5865

Additionally, section 304B of the Code creates the offence of "dowry death." It provides that where the death of a woman is caused by burns or bodily injury or occurs otherwise than under normal circumstances within seven years of her marriage and this occurrence is preceded by cruelty or harassment by the husband or his relatives in connection with the demand for the dowry, the husband or his relatives shall be deemed to have caused the death. Accordingly, the normal rules of causation do not apply; it is sufficient that there was a connection between the death and the cruelty or harassment. The offence is punishable by imprisonment for not less than seven years but may extend to life imprisonment.

Section 498A of the Code and section 113A of the Evidence Act raise a rebuttable presumption that the husband or his relatives have abetted the suicide of his wife if she died within seven years of her marriage under suspicious circumstances.[146] This provision is attracted whenever there is evidence that the deceased woman had been subjected to cruelty by her husband or his relatives, who then have to prove their innocence.

Although these initiatives are commendable, they have been criticized for not going far enough to protect battered wives. In particular, they fail to protect wives who are subjected to beatings and cruelty by their husbands and relatives for reasons unconnected with the obtaining of dowries. For these types of cases, the usual Code offences of causing hurt or grievous hurt apply. A problem with these offences is that they are concerned only with bodily injury and not with mental harm. Also, because they are bailable offences, they enable the offender to be released immediately upon furnishing bail, which poses a grave risk to the wife's personal safety.

G. Voluntary Active Euthanasia and Physician-Assisted Suicide

Suicide is not an offence, but attempted suicide is under section 309 of the Code. The Law Commission of India in its 42nd Report, Penal Code recommended the repeal of this offence on the ground that it was harsh and unjustifiable to punish a person who had already found life so unbearable.[147] The recommendation was accepted by the government but has yet to become law.[148] Abetting (or assisting) suicide is an offence under section 306 of the Code. So too is abetting attempted suicide by virtue of section 309 read with section 107 (the main provision on abetment) of the Code.

These various provisions criminalize both voluntary active euthanasia and assisted suicide performed by physicians on their patients. What role, if any, does the law give to the patient's consent in such cases? If voluntary active euthanasia and assisting suicide are regarded as acts of mercy killing, reference may be made to section 88 of the Code, which states in part that "nothing . . . is an offence by reason of any harm which it may cause, or be intended by the doer to cause . . . to any person for whose benefit it is done in good faith, and who has given consent . . . to suffer that harm."[149] However, this provision is unavailable to a person performing voluntary active euthanasia or assisting suicide because it expressly excludes cases where the accused "intended to cause death." In this regard, it has been observed that section 88 could be relied on by a physician who engages in the accepted medical practice of withdrawing treatment from a terminally ill patient to hasten the process of dying from a disease.[150] The physician does not intend to cause his or her patient's death as such, although he or she knows that the termination of treatment will cause the patient to die more quickly. The same may be said of a physician who administers strong doses of pain-relieving drugs to a patient knowing that a side effect of these drugs is to hasten the patient's death. In both cases the physician could invoke section 88 because he or she had withdrawn the treatment or administered the pain-relieving drugs in good faith for the benefit of the patient, because the patient (who had consented to the medical procedure) was relieved from suffering prolonged and severe pain. Insofar as cases of voluntary active euthanasia by physicians are concerned, consent of the patient is given some significance by reducing what would otherwise be the crime of murder to the lesser offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[151]

3239

5866

There have been several challenges before the Supreme Court to the constitutional validity of the offence of abetting suicide under section 306 of the Code. The leading decision is the Supreme Court case Gian Kaur v. State of Punjab,[152] which involved an appeal by the appellants against their convictions for abetting the commission of suicide by one Kulwant Kaur on the basis that the offence under section 306 was unconstitutional. The court held unanimously that section 309 and, consequently, section 306 did not violate article 21 of the constitution, which embodies the fundamental right to "protection of life."[153] The appellants had argued that this right included both the positive and negative aspects so that the right to live includes the right not to live, that is, the right to die or to end one's life.[154] Accordingly, section 309 violated article 21 by criminalizing attempted suicide. The court rejected this argument by noting that "by no stretch of imagination can 'extinction of life' be read to be included in 'protection of life.'"[155]

On the basis of Gian Kaur, the constitutional validity of the offence of abetting suicide under section 306 can safely be put to rest. However, this does not in any way prevent the legislature from abolishing or qualifying that offence. Although the constitutional basis for the offence may be sound, it is the prerogative of Parliament to decide whether the offence should remain or be qualified in some way. The beginning of the twenty-first century has witnessed India's economy growing as never before, making an increasingly sizable portion of the society able both to afford and to demand medical treatment and services which will prolong life. It will be a matter of time before this social phenomenon spawns the debate, occurring elsewhere, concerning the prohibition of assisted suicide and voluntary active euthanasia conducted by physicians.

SELECTED BIBLIOGRAPHY

(* Revised by these persons.)

Banerjee, T. K. Background to Indian Criminal Law. Bombay: Orient Longmans, 1963.

*Chandra Chud, Y. V., V. R. Manoher, and Avtar Singh. Ratanlal and Dhirajlal's The Indian Penal Code. 31st ed. Nagpur: Wadha & Co., 2006.

3240

5867

Dube, Dipa. Rape Laws in India. New Delhi: LexisNexis, 2008.
Indian Law Institute. Essays on the Indian Penal Code. Rev. ed. New Delhi: Indian Law Institute, 2005.
Law Commission of India. 42nd Report, Penal Code. New Delhi: Government of India, 1971.
Nigam, Ramesh Chandra. Law of Crimes in India. Vol. 1, Principles of Criminal Law. Bombay: Asia Publishing House, 1965.
Raju, Vadrevu Bhadir. Commentaries on the Penal Code. 4th ed. Delhi: Eastern Book Co., 1982.
Saxena, Shobha. Crime against Women and Protective Laws. New Delhi: Deep & Deep Publications, 1995.
*Singh, B. P., and G. S. Sharma. RA Nelson's The Indian Penal Code. 8th ed. Allahabad: Law Book Co., 1996.
*Srivastava, A. B. HS Gour's The Penal Law of India. 11th ed. Allahabad: Law Publishers, 2000.
*Thakker, C. K., and M. C. Thakker. Ratanlal and Dhirajlal's Law of Crimes. 26th ed. New Delhi: Bharat House, 2007.

NOTES

1. Emperor v. Chhotalal Babar (1912) ILR 36 Bom 524.
2. For example, the Indian Army Act 1950.
3. For example, the Indian Merchandise Marks Act 1889, s. 15.
4. Satwant Singh v. State of Punjab AIR 1960 SC 266.
5. Rao Shiv Bahadur Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh 1953 SCR 1188.
6. The General Clauses Act 1897, s. 8(38), reads: "'Offence' shall mean any act or omission made punishable by any law for the time being in force."
7. Penal Code, s. 41.
8. Ibid., s. 42.
9. Ibid., s. 40.
10. Some of the major ones appear in the selected bibliography in this chapter.
11. Ram Chander v. State of Haryana 1981 SCC (Cri) 683.
12. State v. Bhalchandra Waman Pethe AIR 1966 Bom 122 at 126.
13. Dulla v. State AIR 1958 All 198 at 203.
14. Y. V. Chandra Chud, V. R. Manoher, and Avtar Singh, Ratanlal and Dhirajlal's The Indian Penal Code, 31st ed. (Nagpur: Wadha & Co., 2006), 236.
15. Modiram v. State of Madhya Pradesh AIR 1972 SC 2438 at 2439.
16. Emperor v. Bhogilal Chimanal Nanavati AIR 1931 Bom 409 at [5]. Likewise, s. 3 of the Code states that the word act denotes as well a series of acts.
17. Emperor v. Bhogilal Chimanal Nanavati AIR 1931 Bom 409.
18. Emperor v. Kaliappa Goundan AIR 1933 Madras 798; Emperor v. Nebal Mahto (1939) ILR Pat 485.
19. Ramesh Chandra Nigam, Law of Crimes in India, vol. 1, Principles of Criminal Law, (Bombay: Asia Publishing House, 1965), 43.
20. D'Souza v. Pashupati Nath Sarkar 1968 Cri LJ 405.

3241

5868

21. Jai Prakash v. State (Delhi Administration) 1991 2 SCC 32 (Cri) at 42.
22. Basdev v. State of Pepsu AIR 1956 SC 488.
23. In re. Nidarmati Nagabhushanam (1872) 7 MHCR 119 at 120.
24. Empress of India v. Idu Beg (1881) 3 All 776 at 780.
25. Examples are s. 304 (causing death by negligent act); s. 284 (negligent conduct in respect to a poisonous substance); and s. 336 (negligently endangering human life or personal safety).
26. Empress of India v. Idu Beg (1881) 3 All 776 at 780.
27. Bala Chandra v. State of Maharashtra AIR 1968 SC 1319.
28. Emperor v. Waryam Singh 1927 Cri LJ 39.
29. Penal Code, s. 511.
30. For example, Penal Code, s. 307 (attempted murder); s. 308 (attempted culpable homicide not amounting to murder).
31. Abhayanand Mishra v. State of Bihar AIR 1961 SC 1698.
32. State of Maharashtra v. Mohd Yakub AIR 1980 SC 1111.
33. Om Prakash v. State of Punjab AIR 1961 SC 1712.
34. Asgarali Pradhania v. Emperor (1933) ILR 61 Cal 54.
35. Penal Code, s. 120A.
36. Ajay Aggarwal v. Union of India 1993 SCC (Cri) 961.
37. Saleem-Ud-Din v. State (1971) ILR 1 Delhi 432.
38. Pradumna Shriniwas Auradkar v. State of Maharashtra 1981 Cri LJ 1873.
39. Yash Pal Mittal v. State of Punjab AIR 1977 SC 2433.
40. Emperor v. Shankaraya Gurushiddhayya Hiremath AIR 1940 Bom 365.
41. Penal Code, explanation 2 to s. 108.
42. Jamuna Singh v. State of Bihar AIR 1967 SC 553.
43. Penal Code, explanation 4 to s. 108.
44. Girjashankar v. State of Madhra Pradesh 1989 Cri LJ 242.
45. Harachan Chakrabarty v. Union of India 1990 SCC (Cri) 280.
46. Penal Code, explanation 2 to s. 107.
47. Harji v. State of Rajasthan 1978 Raj LW 1.
48. Mohd Jamal v. Emperor AIR 1930 Sind 64.
49. Penal Code, explanation 3 to s. 108.
50. Noor Mohammad Mohd Yusuf Momin v. State of Maharashtra 1971 AIR SC 885. In Jaikrishnadas Manohardas Desai v. State of Bombay AIR 1960 SC 899 it was held that physical presence, though evidential of participation, was not invariably required.
51. Bashir v. State AIR 1953 All 668.
52. This first situation is subscribed to in several decisions of the Supreme Court, e.g., Hardev Singh v. State of Punjab AIR 1975 SC 179. However, there are lower-court case authorities which support the other two situations described in the text.
53. C. K. Thakker and M. C. Thakker, Ratanlal and Dhirajlal's Law of Crimes, 26th ed. (New Delhi: Bharat House, 2007), 143.
54. State of Maharashtra v Syndicate Transport Co Ltd AIR 1964 Bom 195.
55. First developed from the civil case of Lennard's Carrying Company Ltd v. Asiatic Petroleum Company Ltd [1915] AC 705.

3242

5869

56. Gopal Khaitan v. State AIR 1969 Cal 132.
57. Dharma Pratishtan v. B Mandal (1988) 173 ITR 487, following the English case Tesco Supermarkets v. Nattrass [1972] AC 153.
58. Girdharilal v. Lalchand AIR 1970 Raj 145.
59. Municipal Corporation of Delhi v. JB Bottling Company Private Limited 1975 Cri LJ 1148.
60. For example, see Rangawalla v. State of Maharashtra AIR 1965 SC 1616.
61. Yohanan v. State AIR 1958 Ker 207 at 210, cited by several commentators.
62. For example, Yohanan v. State AIR 1958 Ker 207; Nga Moe v. The King AIR Rang 141; Nandkumar Natha v. State 1988 Cri LJ 1313.
63. Constituting ss. 76 to 106 of the Penal Code.
64. Penal Code, s. 6.
65. Ibid., s. 40.
66. James Martin v. State of Kerala (2004) 2 SCC 203.
67. This element is found in the explanation to s. 81.
68. Penal Code, s. 94. Duress is discussed in section II.E.4 in this chapter.
69. This requirement is found in illustration (a) of s. 81.
70. Penal Code, ss. 96–106. The term "self-defence" is used here to cover both defence of person and of property.
71. Ibid., s. 97.
72. Ibid., s. 98.
73. Ibid., s. 99(3).
74. Ibid., s. 100.
75. Ibid., s. 103.
76. Ibid., s. 102.
77. Ibid., s. 99(4).
78. Jai Dev v. State of Punjab AIR 1963 SC 612 at 617.
79. Govindan v. State AIR 1960 Ker 258.
80. Penal Code, ss. 87–92.
81. Dalip Singh v. State of Bihar (2005) SCC 88.
82. By virtue of Penal Code, s. 90(d).
83. Penal Code, explanation to s. 92.
84. See State of West Bengal v. Shew Mangal Singh AIR 1981 SC 1917.
85. Niamat Khan v. Empress (1883) PR No. 17 of 1883 at 29.
86. State v. Krishna Murari 1955 Cr LJ 1025.
87. State of Maharashtra v. Mayer Hans George AIR 1965 SC 722.
88. Thakker and Thakker, Ratanlal and Dhirajlal's Law of Crimes, 276.
89. State of Bombay v. Jaswantlal Manilal Akhaney AIR 1956 SC 575.
90. Chirangi v. State AIR 1952 Nag 282.
91. (1843) 10 Cl. & Fin. 200.
92. Shivraj Singh v. State 1975 Cr LJ 1458.
93. Ashiruddin Ahmed v. The King AIR 1949 Cal 182.
94. Basdev v. State of Pepsu AIR 1956 SC 488.
95. PP v. A Thomas AIR 1959 Mad 166.

3243

587C

96. Ramjanam Singh v. State of Bihar AIR 1956 SC 643.

97. The requirements of mistake of fact and good faith are the same as for the closely related defence under Penal Code, s. 79, discussed in section II.E.1 in this chapter, of mistake of fact that one was justified by law in doing an act.

98. For example, see Queen Empress v. Subba Naik (1898) 21 Mad 249 at 251.

99. Criminal Procedure Code 1973, s. 433A.

100. Probation of Offenders Act 1958, s. 361.

101. Sham Sunder v. Puran AIR 1991 SC 8.

102. Penal Code, s. 109.

103. Ibid., s. 511.

104. Criminal Procedure Code, s. 31(2)(a).

105. Emperor v. Durg AIR 1929 All 260.

106. Deena v. Union of India AIR 1983 SC 1155.

107. Machhi Singh v. State of Punjab AIR 1983 SC 957.

108. Paraphrasing the words "sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death" appearing in Penal Code, s. 300(3).

109. Paraphrasing the words "so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death" appearing in Penal Code, s. 300(4).

110. The maximum penalty is two years' imprisonment.

111. State v. Lazarus AW AIR 1953 All 72.

112. Penal Code, exception 1 to s. 300.

113. Ibid., exception 2 to s. 300.

114. Ibid., exception 3 to s. 300.

115. Ibid., exception 4 to s. 300.

116. Ibid., exception 5 to s. 300.

117. These are specified in Penal Code, ss. 100 and 103.

118. See the discussion under the subheading "Consent," section II.D.3 in this chapter.

119. Gohra v. Emperor (1890) PR No. 7 of 1890; Chanan Khan v. Emperor 1943 Cri LJ 595.

120. Indreswar Kalita v. State 1981 Cri LJ 1887.

121. Nanavati v. State of Maharashtra AIR 1962 SC 605 at 630.

122. Jamu Majhi v. State 1989 Cri LJ 753; Atma Ram v. State 1967 Cri LJ 1697.

123. Penal Code, s. 375.

124. Ibid., s. 90. See the discussion under the subheading "Consent," section II.D.3 in this chapter.

125. Penal Code, s 375, fourth limb.

126. Ibid., s. 79. See the discussion of this plea under the subheading "Mistake/ Ignorance of Law or Fact," section II.E 1 in this chapter.

127. Penal Code, s. 376A.

128. Ibid., s. 354. The offences of assault and criminal force are defined in ss. 351 and 350, respectively, of the Code.

129. Rupan Deol Bajaj v. KPS Gill AIR 1996 SC 309 at [14], quoting from the Shorter English Dictionary, 3d ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1944).

130. In contrast to the offence of rape, the difference being that the definition of rape does not include the intention or knowledge of the defendant pertaining to the victim's consent.

3244

5871

131. Penal Code, s. 377.

132. Ibid., explanations 3 and 4 to s. 378.

133. Ibid., s. 22.

134. Ibid., s. 24.

135. Ibid., s. 23.

136. For a case example favoring the former, see KN Mehra v. State of Rajasthan AIR 1957 SC 369; and for a case favoring the latter, see Packeer Ally v. Svarimuttu (1926) 2 CWR 216.

137. Penal Code, s. 25.

138. Dr Vimla v. The Delhi Administration AIR 1963 SC 1572.

139. Motor Vehicles Act 1988.

140. Public Gambling Act 1867.

141. Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances Act 1985.

142. Penal Code, s. 377.

143. Immoral Traffic (Prevention) Act 1956.

144. Penal Code, s. 268.

145. Ibid., s. 292.

146. Abetment of suicide is an offence under s. 306 of the Code.

147. Law Commission of India. 42nd Report, Penal Code (New Delhi: Government of India, 1971), at [16.33].

148. The Law Commission of India has again recently recommended abolition; see Report No. 210, Humanization and Decriminalization of Attempt to Suicide (New Delhi: Government of India, 2008).

149. See further the discussion of this provision in the subheading "Consent," section II.D.3 in this chapter.

150. This is a form of passive euthanasia; see Airedale National Health Authority Trust v. Bland [1993] AC 789, referred to with approval by the Supreme Court of India in Gian Kaur v. State of Punjab AIR 1996 SC 1257 at [40].

151. Penal Code, Exception 4 to s. 300. See further the discussion of this partial defence to murder under the subheading "Murder/Manslaughter," section III.B.1 in this chapter.

152. AIR 1996 SC 1257.

153. Article 21 reads: "Protection of life and personal liberty: No person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to procedure established by law."

154. Relying on the judgment of the Supreme Court of India in Rathinam v. Union of India AIR 1994 SC 1844, which had held on this basis that s. 309 violated article 21 of the constitution.

155. Gian Kaur v. State of Punjab AIR 1996 SC 1257 at [22], thereby overruling Rathinam on this issue. See also State of Maharashtra v. Maruti Shripati Dubal AIR 1997 SC 411.

3245

5872

OXFORD

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW

3246

5873

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS
Great Clarendon Street, Oxford OX2 6DP

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship,
and education by publishing worldwide in

Oxford New York

Auckland Cape Town Dar es Salaam Hong Kong Karachi
Kuala Lumpur Madrid Melbourne Mexico City Nairobi
New Delhi Shanghai Taipei Toronto

With offices in

Argentina Austria Brazil Chile Czech Republic France Greece
Guatemala Hungary Italy Japan Poland Portugal Singapore
South Korea Switzerland Thailand Turkey Ukraine Vietnam

Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press
in the UK and in certain other countries

Published in the United States
by Oxford University Press Inc., New York

© Oxford University Press 2008

The moral rights of the authors have been asserted

Crown copyright material is reproduced under Class Licence
Number C01P0000148 with the permission of OPSI
and the Queen's Printer for Scotland

Database right Oxford University Press (maker)

First published 2008

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means,
without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press,
or as expressly permitted by law, or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department,
Oxford University Press, at the address above

You must not circulate this book in any other binding or cover
and you must impose the same condition on any acquirer

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Data available

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Data available

Typeset by Newgen Imaging Systems (P) Ltd, Chennai, India
Printed in Great Britain
on acid-free paper by
Ashford Colour Press Ltd, Gosport, Hampshire

ISBN 978–0–40–695904–1

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2

3247

5874

DUE PROCESS AND HUMAN RIGHTS

8.1	Introduction		275
8.2	Applicability of human rights standards		276
8.3	Scope of application		281
8.4	Habeas corpus rights		286
	8.4.1	Pre-trial detention	286
	8.4.2	Unlawful arrest	289
8.5	Fair trial rights		292
	8.5.1	Right to a fair trial in general	293
	8.5.2	Right to an independent and impartial tribunal	295
	8.5.3	Right to be tried within a reasonable time	300
	8.5.4	Right to be presumed innocent, and the privilege against self-incrimination	302
	8.5.5	Right to be informed of the charges	307
	8.5.6	Right to adequate time and facilities	308
	8.5.7	Right to counsel or to defend oneself in person	309
	8.5.8	Right to examine witnesses	314
	8.5.9	Right to appeal	315
	8.5.10	Right to compensation for wrongful arrest or conviction	316
	8.5.11	Protection against double jeopardy	317
8.6	Rights of detained persons		319
8.7	Conclusion		321

8.1 INTRODUCTION

International criminal tribunals are considered important tools for improving the protection of human rights. And rightly so. However, the important mandate of international criminal tribunals should not make us lose sight of the fact that criminal

5875

Unlike the law of the tribunals and the ICC, we make no distinction between the rights of the accused and the rights of suspects. Nor does such distinction exist in human rights law. What matters is an individual's right to liberty and a fair trial, which triggers the applicability of certain rights at different stages of the procedure.

8.5.1 Right to a fair trial in general

The relationship between the specific fair trial rights and the right to a fair trial in a broader sense has yielded two important results. First, the violation of specific rights by definition violates the right to a fair trial in a broader sense, which follows from the reference to them as minimum guarantees.[80] However, the absence of violation of any of the specific minimum guarantees does not automatically warrant the conclusion that the trial as a whole is fair. This brings us to the second point, namely that all the procedural measures bordering on violations of minimum guarantees and elements of a fair trial that have not been translated literally into specific rights may justify the conclusion that there has been no fair hearing. This residual function of the general right to a fair trial serves the useful purpose of making the concept of a fair hearing a dynamic and living reality, capable of adjusting to changing views on fairness and of rectifying omissions that may occur in the law and practice of international criminal courts.[81]

Legal doctrine and practice have given rise to a number of fair trial elements which are not covered by the specific minimum guarantees. In this respect one may mention the right to an adversarial hearing (the principle of audi alteram partem), the principle of equality of arms, and the right to a reasoned judgment. In the context of international criminal proceedings the principle of equality of arms deserves our attention.

The very fact that equality of arms does not enjoy the status of a full right, but of a principle is telling of its nature. Full equality between parties to criminal proceedings is an idle aspiration from a practical perspective and not the required standard in the human rights arena. Rather, the principle has a procedural nature and is closely connected to the right to an adequately prepared defence. Thus, the European Court of Human Rights ruled in this respect that 'each party must be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present his case under conditions that do not place him at a disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent'.[82] It also observed that there can be no violation of this principle when both sides are denied something that might have been useful.[83] In this light, the defence's claim in Tadić that the principle of equality of arms was [80] Cf. Article 21(4) (chapeau) of the ICTY Statute and Article 67(1) (chapeau) of the ICC Statute. See also Trechsel, Human Rights in Criminal Proceedings, at 86.

[81] An example of the latter is the privilege against self-incrimination, which is part of Article 14 of the ICCPR, Article 21 of the ICTY Statute, and Article 67 of the ICC Statute, but not of Article 6 of the anterior ECHR. The European Court of Human Rights has nevertheless developed progressive case law in respect of this right by considering it a vital element of the right to a fair trial.

[82] Bulut v. Austria, 17358/90 [1996] ECtHR 10 (22 February 1996), para. 47.

[83] Jasper v. UK, 27052/95 [2000] ECtHR 90 (16 February 2000), para. 57; Ekbatani v. Sweden, 10563/83 [1988] ECtHR 6 (26 May 1988), para. 30.

3249

5876

Westlaw.

(Cite as:)

Crim. L.F. 2008, 19(3/4), 473-518

Criminal Law Forum

2008

The mental element in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: a commentary from a comparative criminal law perspective

Mohamed Elewa Badar

© 2012 Springer

Subject: International law. Other Related Subject: Criminal law. Legal systems

Keywords: Civil law; Common law; Comparative law; International Criminal Court; International criminal law; Mens rea

Legislation cited: Statute of the International Criminal Court 1998 (United Nations) art.30

473 For the first time in the sphere of international criminal law, and unlike the Nuremberg and Tokyo Charters or the Statutes of the Yugoslavia and Rwanda Tribunals, Article 30 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court provides a general definition for the mental element required to trigger the criminal responsibility of individuals for serious violations of international humanitarian law. The first paragraph of Article 30 stresses that unless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the ratione materiae of the International Criminal Court 'only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge'. The second paragraph identifies the exact meaning of intent, whereas the third paragraph defines the meaning of knowledge.

At first sight, it appears that the explicit words of Article 30 are sufficient to put an end to a long lasting debate regarding the mens rea enigma which has confronted the jurisprudence of the two ad hoc Tribunals for the last decade, but this is not true. Scholars disagree 474 regarding the exact meaning of intent under Article 30. Some view Article 30 as encompassing the three categories of dolus, namely, dolus directus of the first and second degree and dolus eventualis. Others hold the opinion that the plain meaning of Article 30 is confined to d olus directus of the first degree (intent in stricto sensu) and dolus directus of the second degree (indirect or oblique intent).

At present, the only guidance given by the International Criminal Court (ICC) regarding the meaning of 'intent and knowledge' as set out in Article 30 is the decision rendered by Pre-Trial Chamber I (PTC I) of 29 January 2007 in the Lubanga case.1 There, the PTC I asserted that the cumulative reference to 'intent' and 'knowledge' as provided for in Article 30 requires the existence of a volitional element on the part of the accused, and that volitional element encompasses three degrees of dolus, namely, dolus directus of the first and second degrees and dolus eventualis.

This paper examines in depth the elements of culpability as set out in Article 30 from a comparative criminal law perspective as well as the relationship between Article 30 and other provisions of the ICC Statute in light of the Lubanga Decision on the Confirmation of Charges.2 The comparative study undertaken in this paper is significant since the codification of Article 30 - as with other provisions under the Statute - was conducted by several codifiers who brought their own legal cultural experience to the drafting of this provision.3 The paper concludes with some suggestions regarding the mens rea standards which are deemed appropriate to trigger the criminal responsibility of individuals for serious violations of international humanitarian law.

3250

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

I. ANATOMY OF ARTICLE 30 OF THE ICC STATUTE

1.1 Elements Analysis - Mental Elements and their Objects

In order to hold a person criminally responsible and liable for a crime within the jurisdiction of the ICC, it must be established that the 475 material elements of the offence were committed with intent and knowledge. This is expressly mentioned in paragraph 1 of Article 30 of the ICC Statute:

1. Unless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge.4

It is clear that the ICC Statute lacks a general provision regarding the definition of the actus reus or the material elements of the crime, and yet leaves the door open with respect to what should be understood by the phrase 'material elements' as it appears in Article 30(1). This deficiency, however, is remedied by paragraphs (2) and (3) of the same Article which set out the relationship between the mental elements and the material elements of an offence - expressly referred to as conduct, consequence and circumstance.5 In so doing, Article 30 sets itself aside from the broad notion of 'materials elements' as presented in the Model Penal Code or German literature.6 The significance of this provision is that it assigns different levels of mental element to each of the material elements of the crime in question. This is a remarkable shift from an 476 'offence analysis' approach to an 'element analysis' approach.7 Under 'offence analysis', crimes are defined in general terms; intentional crimes, reckless crimes and negligent crimes, whereas 'element analysis' in contrast, recognizes that a single crime definition may require a different culpable state of mind for each objective element of the offence. This approach is similar to the one adopted by the Model Penal Code, in 1962, by the American Law Institute.8 The Model Penal Code's approach is based on the view that, unless some element of mental culpability is proved with respect to each material element of the offence, no valid criminal conviction may be obtained.9 This is explicitly stated in § 2.02(4) of the Model Penal Code (MPC) which is entitled 'prescribed culpability requirement applies to all material elements'. Section 2.02(4) of the MPC reads as follows: 'When the law defining an offence prescribes the kind of culpability that is sufficient for the commission of an offence, without distinguishing among the material elements thereof, such provision shall apply to all the material elements of the offence, unless a contrary purpose plainly appears.'10

Under the ICC Statute, 'element analysis', or the 'rule of mens rea coverage', has to be applied cautiously since culpability terms (a) are defined in Article 30; (b) are stated in the definition of particular crimes (genocide 'with intent to', war crimes of 'wilful killing') or; (c) are stated in the Elements of Crimes.11

1.2 Different Culpability Terms Defined in Relation to Each Objective Element

Article 30 of the ICC Statute - the default rule - assigns different levels of culpability to each of the material elements of the crimes under the subject matter jurisdiction of the Court. Unless otherwise 477 provided, a person has intent in relation to conduct if 'that person means to engage in the conduct'.12 According to the same provision, a person is said to have intended a consequence not only if 'that person means to cause that consequence' but also if he 'is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events'.13 Surprisingly, Article 30 assigns two different culpable states of mind for the consequence element, namely intent and knowledge. Either of these culpable mental states is sufficient to cover the consequence element. Yet, a person who intentionally engages in a proscribed conduct with awareness that a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events may incur criminal liability for any of the crimes within the ratione materiae of the Court (unless otherwise provided). Yet, one might argue that dolus directus of second degree or oblique intent is sufficient mens rea to trigger the criminal responsibility of individuals for serious violations of international humanitarian law under the ICC Statute.

As for the circumstance element - a material element which is related to the knowledge or awareness of a defendant and not to his intention - the ICC Statute required a culpable state of knowledge (knowing standards). This means the defendant's awareness of the existence of a circumstance.14

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

Thus, the general rule under Article 30 is the full coverage of the material elements by the corresponding mental elements. Problems may arise regarding special types of material elements (I will name them quasi-material elements) which do not fall under the three categories of the materials elements mentioned above and accordingly may not be covered by the default rule of Article 30 - intent and/or knowledge. There are three different types of these quasimaterial elements. The first type is the quasi-material element of a 'legal character'. For instance, Article 8(2)(a) of the ICC Statute requires that a victim be a protected person under the Geneva Conventions of 1949. According to some commentators the default rule of Article 30 does not apply to such factual elements since this provision 'does not require proof that the accused knew the relevant law or that he or she correctly completed such a legal evaluation.'15 Yet, one might argue that Article 32(2) has no role to play in such 478 situations. It is not clear, however, whether this is considered a mistake of law, or a mistake of fact or a combination of both - mistake of mixed fact and law.16 This issue will be examined later in detail when we discuss the relationship between Articles 30 and 32 of the ICC Statute.

The second type of quasi-material element involves a normative aspect or a value judgement.17 The requirement of 'serious injury to body' as provided for in Article 7(1)(k) - crimes against humanity of other inhuman acts - and Article 8(2)(a)(iii) - grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of wilfully causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or health - is an example of a quasi-material element which involve a value judgment. In such case, the prosecution is not entitled to demonstrate that the accused 'correctly completed a normative evaluation.'18 Otherwise, the accused's subjective opinion would be the sole determinative factor in finding whether a crime had been committed.19

The third category includes circumstantial elements; the widespread or systematic attack for crimes against humanity and the existence of an armed conflict for war crimes. This type of element was referred to during the negotiations of the Elements of Crimes as 'contextual elements'.20 If this element is to be considered a material element, it should as a rule - element analysis - be covered by a corresponding mental element. There is a consensus among scholars that such a contextual element is related to the broader context that renders the crime an international crime, and accordingly the default rule - intent and knowledge - does not apply to them.21

479 II. DIFFERENT DEGREES OF MENTAL ELEMENTS UNDER ARTICLE 30

Article 30 is in line with the Latin maxim actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea. This provision, however, goes further, assuring that the mental element consists of two components: a volitional component of intent and a cognitive component of knowledge. In so doing, Article 30 confirms the evolutionary developments of the law of mens rea under the jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals which demand that, for the imposition of criminal responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law, both a cognitive and volitional component must be incorporated into the legal standard.22

2.1 The Meaning of Intent

Generally speaking, in criminal law the word 'intent' or the adjective 'intentionally' have traditionally not been limited to the narrow definition of purpose, aim, or design. According to common law tradition, a person is considered to intend the consequence not only if (i) his conscious objective is to cause that consequence, but also (ii) if he acts with knowledge that the consequence is virtually certain to occur as a result of his conduct.23 The term 'intent' as set out in Article 30 has two different meanings, depending upon whether the material element related to conduct or consequence. A person has intent in relation to conduct, if he 'means to engage in the conduct',24 whereas in relation to consequence, a person is said to have intent if 'that person means to cause that consequence' or 'is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events'.25

480 2.2 Intent in Relation to Conduct

Pursuant to Article 30(2)(a) of the ICC Statute, a person is said to have intent in relation to conduct if that person means to engage in the conduct. This definition has two aspects. First, the relationship between intent and conduct as set out in Article 30(2)(a), 'seems closer to what common lawyers often think of the "volitional" part of an "act" (deliberately pulling a trigger as opposed to a reflex action, for example).'26 Yet, 'the conduct must be the result of a voluntary action on the part of the perpetrator.'27 Professor Roger Clark, however, noted that knowledge is not defined in relation to conduct and this 'may create some mischief later.'28 It is submitted that unless relevant circumstances are known that qualify the action as illegal it cannot be said that the person intends the conduct.29 Generally, the prosecution must prove that the defendant had knowledge of facts which would make the conduct illegal, but ordinarily is not required to prove the defendant's awareness of the legal consequences of the conduct (e.g. that the conduct was illegal).30

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

Second, with regard to conduct, the drafting history of the Rome Statute shows that there was a strong will to include within the Statute an article defining conduct as an act or omission.31 The Draft Statute prepared by the Preparatory Committee in 1996 included a provision headed 'Actus reus ' (act and/or omission)32 which was modified at the February 1997 session and submitted to the Rome 481 Conference.33 The term 'conduct' was defined under then Article 28 to 'constitute either an act or an omission, or a combination thereof'. The Rome Conference had difficulty reaching agreement on the circumstances in which a person can incur criminal responsibility for an omission. As a consequence, the entire provision was deleted from the Statute 'with the understanding that the question of when and if omissions might constitute or be equivalent to conduct would have to be resolved in future by the Court.'34

Professor Albin Eser holds the view that conduct, as laid down in paragraph 2(a) of Article 30, is only limited to positive action. According to Eser, cases of omissions within the Statute are not covered by the default rule of Article 30 (intent and knowledge), 'but would rather need special regulation according to the opening words of paragraph 1 (unless otherwise provided)'.35 Other commentators noted that the very definitions of most of the crimes under the Rome Statute explicitly provide that they can be committed only by an act. Yet, there are some that can be said to provide room for such interpretation that encompasses omissions as well. Thus, such crime as wilful killing (article 8 para. 2(a)(i)) is capable of being interpreted in such way that includes faults of omission too. In that case it would cover, for instance, failure to feed prisoners of war or to provide medical care to wounded persons or to rescue shipwrecked persons belonging to a hostile armed forces.36

A recent decision, rendered by the ICC PTC I expressly referred to Article 30 as covering acts or omissions.37 In addition, the practice of the Yugoslavia and Rwanda Tribunals is consistent that 'committing', as set out in Articles 7(1)/6(1) of the ICTY/ICTR Statutes, respectively, 'covers physically perpetrating a crime or engendering a culpable omission in violation of criminal law'.38

482 2.3 Intent in Relation to Consequence - the First Alternative of Intent

Pursuant to Article 30(2)(b) of the ICC Statute, a person has intent in relation to consequence if he (i) 'means to cause that consequence' or (ii) 'is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.' Thus, Article 30(2)(b) assigned two different degrees of intent in relation to the consequence element, namely direct intent or dolus directus of first degree and indirect intent or dolus directus of second degree. The issue whether dolus eventualis or subjective recklessness is sufficient to fall within the ambit of Article 30 is highly debatable and is subject to a detailed examination below.

These culpable mental states have to be assessed subjectively and not objectively, meaning that the prosecution must demonstrate that the perpetrator himself, and not a reasonable person in the same situation, was aware of the occurrence of the consequence in question. From a comparative criminal law perspective, the first degree of intent (direct intent/dolus directus of first degree) denotes the state of mind of a person who not only foresees but also wills the occurrence of a consequence. This is the actual meaning of intent in common law jurisdictions.

It is also equivalent to the Model Penal Code culpability term 'purposely'. Section 2.02 of the Model Penal Code considers a person acts 'purposely' with regard to a result if it is his conscious object to cause such result.39 In United States v. Bailey et al., the Supreme 483 Court ruled that a 'person who causes a particular result is said to act purposefully if he consciously desires that result, whatever the likelihood of that result happening from his conduct.'40*Absicht,* or dolus directus of first degree, in German criminal law, is also identical to 'direct intent' as defined in Article 30(2)(b) of the ICC Statute. 'Absicht ' is defined as a 'purpose bound will'.41 In this type of intent, the actor's will is directed finally towards the accomplishment of that result.42

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

In the Lubanga case,43 the first test ever of Article 30, PTC I of the ICC asserted that the reference to 'intention' and 'knowledge' in a conjunctive way requires the existence of a 'volitional element' on the part of the suspect.44 This 'volitional element' refers first to situations in which the suspect (i) knows that his acts or omissions will materialize the material elements of the crime at issue; and (ii) he undertakes these acts or omissions with the concrete intention to bring about the material elements of the crime. According to the PTC I, the above-mentioned scenario requires that the suspect possesses a level of intent which it called dolus directus of the first degree.45

It is worth stressing that 'direct intent', as defined in Article 30(2)(b) of the ICC Statute, is not identical to the 'special intent' required for particular crimes which in their definitions include the following terms: 'with intent to',46 'with the intent of affecting',47 and 484 'with the intention of'.48 The 'special intent' or dolus specialis required for these categories of crimes has no material element (consequence or result element) to cover, since the accomplishment of this consequence is not an ingredient element of the crime at issue.49

2.4 Intent in Relation to Consequence - the Second Alternative of Intent

Article 30(2)(b) of the ICC Statute assigns a second alternative of intent with regard to the consequence element, providing that even if the perpetrator does not intend the proscribed result to occur, he is considered to intend that result if he 'is aware that [the consequence] will occur in the ordinary course of events'. In the Lubanga case the PTC I asserted that Article 30 encompasses other aspects of dolus, namely dolus directus of the second degree.50 This type of dolus arises in situations in which the suspect, without having the actual intent to bring about the material elements of the crime at issue, is aware that such elements will be the necessary outcome of his actions or omissions.51 Yet, there are three important aspects of this second alternative of intent.

First, this degree of mens rea is akin to 'knowledge' or 'awareness' rather than 'intent stricto sensu '. This position is supported by the definition given to 'knowledge' in paragraph 3 of Article 30, '[f]or the purpose of this article, "knowledge" means awareness that ... a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events.' The essence of the narrow distinction between acting intentionally and knowingly with regard to the consequence element is the presence or absence of a positive desire or purpose to cause that consequence. The plain meaning of Article 30(2) makes it clear that once the prosecution demonstrates that an accused, in carrying out his conduct, was aware that the proscribed consequence will occur, unless extraordinary circumstances intervened, he is said to have intended that consequence. Thus, a soldier who aims to destroy a building, while not wishing to kill civilians whom he knows are in the building, is said to 485 intend the killing of the civilians (Article 8(2)(a)(i) of the ICC Statute) if the building is in fact destroyed and the civilians are killed.52

Secondly, the phrase 'aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events' is subject to different interpretations. Does it require that the perpetrator foresees the occurrence of the consequence as certain? Or whether mere awareness of the probable occurrence of the consequence is sufficient? Professor Triffterer has suggested that since Article 30(2)(b) explicitly states 'will occur' and not 'might occur', it would not be enough to prove that the perpetrator is aware of the probability of the consequence and nevertheless carrying out the conduct which results in the proscribed consequence.53 Rather, the prosecution must demonstrate that the perpetrator foresees the consequence of his conduct as being certain unless extraordinary circumstances intervene.54 Interestingly, this second alternative of intent is identical to the Model Penal Code culpability term 'knowingly'. Pursuant to § 2.02(2)(b)(ii) of the Model Penal Code, a person acts knowingly with respect to a result if it is not his conscious objective, yet he is practically certain that his conduct will cause that result.55

It is also equivalent to the common law concept of 'oblique intent', which extends the meaning of intention to encompass foresight of a certainty.56 Professor Glanville Williams, who devoted special attention to the notion of 'oblique intention,' argued that the law should generally be the same where the defendant is aware that a consequence in the future is the certain result of what he does, though he does not intend or desire its occurrence.57

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

In cases of oblique intention, there are twin consequences of the conduct, x and y ; the actor wants x and is prepared to accept its unwanted twin y.58 Oblique intent, in the words of Glanville Williams, is 'a kind of 486 knowledge or realization.'59 In Regina v. Buzzanga and Durocher, a case concerned with promoting hatred against the French Canadian public in Essex County, the Ontario Court of Appeal adopted William's notion of 'foresight of certainty' as a second alternative of intent:

as a general rule, a person who foresees that a consequence is certain or substantially certain to result from an act which he does in order to achieve some other purpose, intends that consequence. The actor's foresight of the certainty or moral certainty of the consequence resulting from his conduct compels a conclusion that if he, none the less, acted so as to produce it, then he decided to bring it about (albeit regretfully) in order to achieve his ultimate purpose. His intention encompasses the means as well as to his ultimate objective.60

It also resembles the German concept of dolus directus of the second degree in which the cognitive element (knowledge or awareness) dominates, whereas the volitional element is too weak. As the German Federal Supreme Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof-BGH) put it more clearly, a perpetrator who foresees a consequence of his conduct as certain is considered to act wilfully with regard to this consequence, even if he regrets its occurrence.61 Professor Albin Eser's thoughtful explanation as to the nature and meaning of the phrase 'aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events' merits lengthy quotation:

Whatever may be meant by 'ordinary course of events', with regard to the awareness thereof this clause is obviously meant to cover dolus directus in the second degree in which the volitional component of intention seems to be substituted by the cognitive component in terms of the perpetrators being aware that the action will result in the prohibited consequence (though not desired) with certainty, as in the case of bombing a building inhabited by members of a persecuted ethnical group where some of them will unavoidably be killed, with the further inevitable consequence of 487 destroying parts of this group. If in this case the genocidal act is considered as 'intentional' although the bomb planter may not have desired to kill any people or does not personally support the ethnical cleansing intentions of his superiors, this conclusion can be supported by attributional as well as evidentiary arguments: with regard to attributing consequences to the causer, it does not matter whether he was directly aiming at them or whether he, in pursuing a different goal, was prepared to let the prohibited result occur, thus using it as means to another end, as in the case where it is the military commander's first priority to destroy the building for strategic reasons while knowing with certainty that this goal could not be reached without killing innocent inhabitants. And from an evidentiary point of view, one could argue that, in acting though aware of the prohibited consequences, the perpetrator was indeed willing to accept them. This position is at least feasible so long as the perpetrator assumes that the prohibited consequences 'will' occur, as required by subparagraph (b).62

While some legal scholars view the second alternative of intent as excluding concepts of dolus eventualis or recklessness,63 others advocate the inclusion of recklessness and dolus eventualis in the legal standard of Article 30.64 As far as the drafting history is concerned, 488 Professor Roger Clark noted that 'dolus eventualis fell out of the written discourse before Rome. Recklessness, in the sense of subjectively taking a risk to which the actor's mind has been directed, was ultimately to vanish also from the Statute at Rome, with again only an implicit decision as to whether it was appropriate for assessing responsibility.'65 Before going further to examine whether recklessness and dolus eventualis fall under the realm of Article 30 of the ICC Statute it is desirable to discuss the meaning of these concepts under common and civil legal systems.

2.5 Recklessness in Common Law Systems

The law of England, as it currently stands, defines recklessness as the conscious taking of an unjustifiable risk. The term 'recklessly' is used to denote the subjective sate of mind of a person who foresees that his conduct may cause the prohibited result but nevertheless takes a deliberate and unjustifiable risk of bringing it about.66 A modern Canadian writer, Don Stuart, asserted that the proper test to be followed in such situations is to examine whether D, given his shortcomings and strengths, foresaw the consequence or circumstance. He concluded that whether D 'ought', 'could' or 'should' - as a reasonable person - have thought about the occurrence of the consequence or the existence of such circumstances is not the right test to be applied.67 In Sansregret v. *The Queen,*68 a case before the Supreme Court of Canada, the subjective approach for recklessness was authoritatively asserted as follows:

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

In accordance with well established principles for the determination of criminal liability, recklessness, to form a part of the criminal mens rea, must have an element of the subjective. It is found in the attitude of one who, aware that there is a danger that his conduct could bring about the result prohibited by the criminal law, nevertheless persists, despite the risk. It is in other words, the conduct of one who sees 489 the risk and who take the chance. It is in this sense that the term 'recklessness' is used in the criminal law and it is clearly distinct from the concept of civil negligence.69

The term recklessness, as used in the Model Penal Code, involves conscious risk creation, an element which differentiates it from acting either purposely or knowingly. It is a state of mind distinct from intent.70 The Code provides that a person acts 'recklessly' if (1) he 'consciously disregards a substantial and unjustified risk that the material element exits or will result from his conduct.'71 According to the Code, a risk is 'substantial and unjustifiable' if 'considering the nature and purpose of the actor's conduct and the circumstances known to him, its disregard involves a gross deviation from the standard of conduct that a law-abiding person would observe in the actor's situation.'72 In United States v. *Albers,*73 it was held that a finding of recklessness may only be made when persons disregard a risk of harm of which they are aware.74 The requirement that the actor consciously disregard the risk is the most significant part of the definition of recklessness. It is this concept which differentiates a reckless actor from a negligent one.75

2.6 Dolus Eventualis in Romano-Germanic Law Systems

Dolus eventualis is a well known concept in most of the Romano-Germanic legal systems. This type of dolus is recognized under the Italian criminal law as dolo eventuale. Pursuant to Article 43 of the Italian Codice Penale, all serious crimes require proof of the mental element known as dolo, which means that the prohibited result must be both preveduto (foreseen) and voluto (wanted/willed). According to the Italian criminal law, a result may be voluto even though it is not desired, if, having contemplated the possibility of bringing it about by pursuing a course of conduct, the perpetrator is prepared to run the 490 risk of doing so dolo eventuale. Even a small risk may be voluto if the accused has reconciled himself to, or accepted it as a part of the price he was prepared to pay to secure his objective.76

Dolus eventualis (bedingter Vorsatz) and especially its element of will are still a matter of dispute in German legal system. On the one hand, case law concerning this element is inconsistent. On the other hand, a considerable number of German legal scholars contend that dolus eventualis requires only an intellectual element, which most of them define as foresight of 'concrete possibility'.77 German literature, as well as courts, treated dolus eventualis differently according to different theories on the subject. The following will examine the "consent and approval theory". This theory is applied by German courts,78 and is usually referred to as the 'theory on consent and approval' (Einwilligungs - und Billigungstheorie).79 The majority of German legal scholars who ascribe to this theory use a slightly different definition for dolus eventualis. They are of the opinion that the offender must 'seriously consider' (ernstnehmen) the result's occurrence and must accept the fact that his conduct could fulfil the legal elements of the offence.80 Another way of putting the point is to say the offender must 'reconcile himself' (sich abfinden) with the prohibited result.81

This theory was implicitly adopted by the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) in the Stakic case.82 In establishing the requisite mens rea for the crime of murder as a Violation of the Laws or Customs of War under Article 3 of the ICTY, the Yugoslavia Tribunal had the following understanding regarding the technical definition of dolus eventualis : 'if the actor engages in life-endangering behaviour, his killing becomes intentional if he "reconciles himself" or "makes peace" with the likelihood of 491 death.'83 If, to the contrary, the offender is 'confident' (vertrauen) and has reason to believe that the result - though he foresees it as a possibility - will not occur, he lacks dolus eventualis and acts only negligently.84

In principle, and in order to avoid any uncertainties or ambiguities which may shadow the present discussion, we have to concede that dolus eventualis, like other types of dolus, namely dolus directus and dolus indirectus, should include the two components of intent: knowledge and wilfulness. Thus, if one of these components is missing, dolus eventualis no longer exists on the part of the perpetrator.85

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

2.7 Dolus Eventualis, Recklessness and the Lubanga Decision

As already mentioned, in the Lubanga case, PTC I of the ICC asserted that the reference to 'intention' and 'knowledge' in a conjunctive way, as set out in Article 30, requires the existence of a 'volitional element' on the part of the suspect.86 Aware that the jurisprudence of the two ad hoc Tribunals has recognised other degrees of culpable mental states than that of direct intent (dolus directus of the first degree) and indirect intent (dolus directus of the second degree),87 the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber went further, assuring that the volitional element mentioned above also encompasses other aspects of dolus, namely *dolus eventualis.*88 According to the Pre-Trial Chamber dolus eventualis applies in situations in which the suspect '(a) is aware of the risk that the objective elements of the crime may result from his or her actions or omissions, and (b) accepts such an outcome by reconciling himself or herself with it or consenting to it.'89 The Pre-Trial Chamber found it necessary to distinguish between two types of scenarios regarding the degree of probability of the occurrence of the consequence from which intent can be inferred:

Firstly, if the risk of bringing about the objective elements of the crime is substantial (that is, there is a likelihood that it "will occur in the ordinary course of events"), the 492 fact that the suspect accepts the idea of bringing about the objective elements of the crime can be inferred from:

(i) the awareness by the suspect of the substantial likelihood that his or her actions or omissions would result in the realisation of the objective elements of the crime; and

(ii) the decision by the suspect to carry out his or her actions or omissions despite such awareness.

Secondly, if the risk of bringing about the objective elements of the crime is low, the suspect must have clearly or expressly accepted the idea that such objective elements may result from his or her actions or omissions.90

However, in situations where the suspect's mental state 'falls short of accepting that the objective elements of the crime may result from his or her actions or omissions, such a state of mind cannot qualify as a truly intentional realisation of the objective elements, and hence would not meet the "intent and knowledge" requirement embodied in article 30 of the Statute.'91

There are two important aspects of the PTC's clarification regarding the mens rea contours as set out in Article 30 of the ICC Statute. First, it appears that the Chamber adhered to the Romano-Germanic concept of intent which consists of two components, namely, Wissen and Wollen (Germany), preveduto and voluto (Italy), or la conscience and la volonté (France).92

493 Second, by requiring the existence of a volitional element on the part of the accused - in the sense of accepting the consequence - the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber accepted the civil law concept of dolus eventualis and ruled out the common law recklessness, as the latter falls short of meeting the mens rea threshold as set out in Article 30.93

The Lubanga PTC I provided further clarification as to the reason of ruling out the notion of recklessness from the realm of Article 30 of the ICC Statute:

The concept of recklessness requires only that the perpetrator be aware of the existence of a risk that the objective elements of the crime may result from his or her actions or omissions, but does not require that he or she reconcile himself or herself with the result. In so far as recklessness does not require the suspect to reconcile himself or herself with the causation of the objective elements of the crime as a result of his or her actions or omissions, it is not part of the concept of intention.94

It is significant in this regard to recall Professor Antonio Cassese's concerns, almost eight years prior to the Lubanga decision, regarding the exclusion of the notion of recklessness by the drafters of the Rome Statute:

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

While it is no doubt meritorious to have defined these two notions [intent and knowledge in Article 30], it appears questionable to have excluded recklessness as a culpable mens rea under the Statute. One fails to see why, at least in the case of war crimes, this last mental element may not suffice for criminal responsibility to arise. Admittedly, in the case of genocide, crimes against humanity and aggression, the extreme gravity of the offence presuppose that it may only be perpetrated when 494 intent and knowledge are present. However, for less serious crimes, such as war crimes, current international law must be taken to allow for recklessness: for example, it is admissible to convict a person who, when shelling a town, takes a high an unjustifiable risk that civilian will be killed - without, however, intending, that they be killed - with the result that the civilians are, in fact, thereby killed.95

Cassese continued his criticism regarding the exclusion of recklessness as a culpable mental element under the Rome Statute in the following words:

Hence, on this score the Rome Statute marks a step backwards with respect to lex lata, and possibly creates a loophole: persons responsible for war crimes, when they acted recklessly, may be brought to trial and convicted before national courts, while they would be acquitted by the ICC. It would seem that the draughtsmen have unduly expanded the shield they intended to provide to the military.96

However, it would be a profound mistake to draw from Cassese's hypothetical example that those persons will escape justice by claiming that their main aim was merely shelling a military objective and that they lack any intention regarding the killing of civilians. In such situations, those actors can incur criminal responsibility under the concept of dolus eventualis if the prosecution succeeds in demonstrating that in shelling the towns, it was probable that those civilians would be killed and that the actors accept such a result. Triffterer, for instance, has argued that the concepts of recklessness and dolus eventualis can be read within the text of Article 30 since the phrase 'will occur' as provided for in Article 30 of the ICC Statute may be interpreted to encompass situations in which 'the perpetrator is aware that a consequence might occur and nevertheless engages in taking action tending in that direction, thereby accepting its consequences'.97 Kai Ambos disagrees:

Certainly, reckless conduct cannot be the basis of responsibility since a corresponding provision was deleted. The same applies for the higher threshold of dolus eventualis : this is a kind of "conditional intent" by which a wide range of subjective attitudes towards the result are expressed and, thus, implies a higher threshold than recklessness. The perpetrator may be indifferent to the result or be "reconciled" with the harm as a possible cost of attaining his or her goal... However, [in such situations of dolus eventualis] the perpetrator is not, as required by Article 30(2)(b), aware that 495 a certain result or consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events. He or she only thinks that the result is possible. Thus, the wording of Article 30 hardly leaves room for an interpretation which includes dolus eventualis within the concept of intent as a kind of "indirect intent."98

The exclusion of recklessness as a culpable mental element within the meaning of Article 30 runs in harmony with the basic principles of Islamic law (Shari 'a) that no one shall be held criminal responsible for hudud crimes (offences with fixed mandatory punishments) or qisas crimes (retaliation) unless he or she has wilfully or intentionally ('amdan) committed the crime at issue.99

2.8 The Meaning of Knowledge

Paragraph three of Article 30 provides two definitions of knowledge. The first applies to consequences, whereas the second pertains to attendant circumstances. Under the ICC Statute, the distinction between acting 'intentionally' and 'knowingly' is very narrow. Knowledge that a consequence 'will occur in the ordinary course of events' is a common element in both conceptions.'100 A result is 'knowingly' caused if the actor is aware that 'a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events'.101 With 'attendant circumstances', one acts 'knowingly' if he is aware 'that a circumstance exists'.102

2.9 Knowledge in Relation to the Circumstance Element

Logically speaking, there is no offence which requires the prosecution to prove that the accused, in the true sense, intends a particular circumstance to exist at the time he carries out his conduct. If the accused intends a circumstance to exist, it means that he hopes it exists or will exist. According to the ICC Statute, knowledge as to the circumstance element arises in various situations. It can relate to circumstances forming part of the definition of the crime, i.e. the requirement of knowledge of the widespread or systematic attack 496 directed against any civilian population as provided for in the chapeau element of Article 7.103 The same can be said regarding the crime of rape, punishable as a crime against humanity104 or as a war crime,105 where the non-consent of the victim and the perpetrator's knowledge thereof is considered as constitutive element of the offence.106 The wording of Article 30 makes it clear that 'knowingly' refers to the actor's subjective state of mind and not the state of mind of a reasonable person.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

Additionally, in defining 'knowledge' to mean the perpetrator's 'awareness that a circumstance exists', Article 30(3) limits the meaning of knowledge to 'actual knowledge' as opposed to 'constructive knowledge'. Even knowledge of 'high probability' of the existence of a particular fact does not pass Article 30's culpability test.107 There is reason to question whether the doctrine of 'wilful blindness' or 'wilfully shutting one's eyes to the obvious' satisfies the mens rea threshold of Article 30(3). The answer can be in the affirmative if the doctrine is understood to apply only in situations where the perpetrator is virtually certain that the fact exists, or, as stated by Glanville Williams:

A court can properly find wilful blindness only where it can almost be said that the defendant actually knew. He suspected the fact; he realized its probability; but he refrained from obtaining the final confirmation because he wanted in the event to be able to deny knowledge. This and this alone, is wilful blindness.108

Any attempts to stretch the wilful blindness doctrine by accepting some lesser degree of knowledge instead of actual knowledge would 497 blur the distinction between wilful blindness and recklessness. There are, however, exceptions to the application of the 'actual knowledge' standard with regard to the factual elements of particular crime. The Elements of Crimes of the 'war crime of using, conscripting or enlisting children' under the age of fifteen years into the national armed forces, or using them to participate actively in hostilities,109 allow for a lower level of knowledge than that of 'actual knowledge'.110 According to paragraph three of the Elements of Article 8(2)(b)(xxvi) the perpetrator can incur criminal responsibility if he 'knew' or 'should have known' that the child concerned was under the age of 15. Thus, the Elements of Crimes made it clear that 'constructive knowledge' is a sufficient mens rea standard with regard to the circumstance element of this crime. As a consequence, this crime falls into the realm of 'negligence crimes' where conviction depends upon proof that the perpetrator had 'reasonable cause' to believe or suspect some relevant fact, in the present case, that the child concerned was under the age of 15.

The vital point is that constructive knowledge differs from the two other degrees of knowledge, namely, actual knowledge and wilful blindness, in requiring neither awareness nor purposive avoidance of the means of learning the truth. Another way of putting the point is to say that the perpetrator may incur criminal liability for being negligent with regard to a circumstance when, as reasonable person, he ought to know that such 'circumstance exists or will exist and fails to do so, whether he has given thought to the question or not.'111

Another example of lowering the actual knowledge standard to reach the one of constructive knowledge appears at the third paragraph of the Elements of the "war crimes of improper use of a flag of truce"112 and the "war crime of improper use of a flag, insignia or 498 uniform of the hostile party".113 According to the third paragraph common to both provisions, it is sufficient to hold the perpetrator criminally liable if he 'knew or should have known of the prohibited nature of such use.'114 The term 'prohibited nature' denotes the illegality of the conduct.

It is obvious that such a negligence standard is inconsistent with the mens rea threshold as set out in Article 30 of the Rome Statute - that all the materials elements of a crime be committed with intent and knowledge.

III. THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN ARTICLE 30 AND OTHER PROVISIONS OF THE ICC STATUTE

3.1 Article 30 vis-à-vis the Culpability Requirements Stated in an Offence Definition

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

As noted by Professor Schabas, several crimes within the subject matter jurisdiction of the ICC have their 'own built-in mens rea requirement.'115 The crime of genocide, punishable under Article 6 of the ICC Statute, is defined as a proscribed act committed 'with intent to destroy' a protected group.116 The chapeau element of crimes against humanity requires a subjective element of knowledge that the attack was carried out in a widespread or systematic manner against a civilian population.117 Extermination, a crime against humanity, 'includes the intentional infliction of conditions of life ... calculated to bring about the destruction of part of a population.'118 Several war crimes punishable as grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, or serious violations of the laws and customs of war under Article 8 of the ICC Statute, have their own built-in mens rea such as the adjectives 'wilful', 'wilfully', 'wantonly', 'intentionally', or 'treacherously'.119

499 The first question which arises is whether the mens rea threshold of Article 30 would automatically apply to cover the material elements of such offences, even if the crime at issue contains in its language a mental element. The second question is an outcome of the first. If the crime at issue required a lower or a higher threshold than the one provided for in Article 30, which threshold should then prevail? In other words, does Article 30 allow a departure from the mens rea standard laid down in it? Another difficulty appears in applying the rule of 'mens rea coverage' to particular crimes which require a proof of 'special intent' (e.g. the intent to destroy a group in the crime of genocide). In such types of offences, this 'ulterior intent' has no material element to cover, since the actual destruction of a group is not an ingredient element of the offence.

'Unless otherwise provided', a proviso which is set out in the very beginning of the first paragraph of Article 30, appears to come as the Prince who redeems Cinderella from her poor circumstances. According to this proviso, ICC judges have to consider Article 30 as a default rule that is applied to all crimes and modes of participation in criminal conduct, as long as there are no specific rules on the mental element expressly stated in these provisions,120 and hence paving the road to the application of the lex specialis principle. Donald Piragoff, who was the first to comment on Article 30, has a different opinion regarding the relationship between Article 30 and particular crimes which requires that the material elements be 'intentional' or be committed 'intentionally'. He noted that given the general rule in Article 30, the inclusion of these adjectives in the definition of particular crimes 'is likely unnecessary surplusage'.121 He pointed out that '[t]he specific presence of these terms is likely a product of the negotiations process whereby certain delegations wished to make clear the intentional nature of the crimes before they agreed to their inclusion in article 7 and 8.'122 It was said that the only significance of 500 Article 30 to these provisions is that it imports the element of knowledge into those definitions of crimes.123

But the subjective elements included in the definition of the crime against humanity of extermination are not merely redundant. Article 7(2)(b) of the ICC Statute defines extermination to include 'the intentional infliction of conditions of life ... calculated to bring about the destruction of part of a population.' The term 'calculated' as it appears in Article 7(2)(b) can be interpreted as requiring a higher threshold of mens rea than that provided for in the default rule of Article 30. It can be interpreted as requiring an element of premeditation, a subjective mental state which requires that the accused, at a minimum, held a deliberate plan to exterminate prior to the act causing the destruction of part of a population, rather than forming the intention simultaneously with the act.

By including the 'unless otherwise provided' in the provision of Article 30, the codifiers of the ICC Statute have achieved several goals. On the one hand, Article 30, for the first time in the sphere of international criminal law, sets a general requirement for international criminal liability which is based on intent and knowledge. On the other hand, 'unless otherwise provided' enables the Statute to absorb the corresponding rules of international humanitarian law (the definition of war crimes under Article 8) without having to modify the definitions of these crimes. It also enables the Statute to adopt verbatim the definition of the crime of genocide, as defined in the 1948 Genocide Convention, without having to change any of its subjective elements.

3.2 Article 30 vis-à-vis the Elements of Crimes

Article 30 of the ICC Statute has to be read together with several provisions set out in the ICC Statute. Article 21, which constitutes the first codification of the sources of international criminal law, establishes a hierarchy of applicable law to be applied by judges of the International Criminal Court.124 According to Article 21(1)(a) of the ICC Statute, the Court shall apply in the first place (i) its Statute, (ii) Elements of Crimes and (iii) its Rules of Procedure and Evidence.125

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

501 It is worth stressing that the general introduction to the Elements of Crimes126 which consists of ten paragraphs has great significance to the interpretation and the application of Article 30. Paragraph one of the general introduction reiterates the provision laid down in Article 9(1) of the ICC Statute and reaffirms that the Elements of Crimes 'shall assist the Court in the interpretation and application of articles 6, 7, and 8.'

Paragraph 2 states that 'where no reference is made in the Elements of Crimes to a mental element for any particular conduct, consequence or circumstance listed, it is understood that the relevant mental element, i.e. intent, knowledge, or both, set out in Article 30, applies. Exceptions to the Article 30 standard, based on the Statute, including applicable law under its relevant provisions, are indicated below.'

According to paragraph 3, 'existence of intent and knowledge can be inferred from relevant facts and circumstances.' Paragraph 4 provides that 'with respect to mental elements associated with elements involving value judgment, such as those using the terms "inhumane" or "severe", it is not necessary that the perpetrator personally completed a particular value judgment, unless otherwise indicated'.

Paragraph 2 of the general introduction will come into play in situations where the Elements of Crimes for particular crimes, provide for a lower threshold of mens rea (negligence standard) than that of Article 30. For instance, while Article 30(3) of the ICC Statute assigns a knowledge standard with regard to the circumstance element of the crime of genocide by 'forcibly transferring children of the group to another group' (the age of the victim concerned),127 the Elements of Crimes introduce a negligence standard (should have known) with regard to the same circumstance element of this offence. Addressing this point Professor Claus Kress had this to say:

It is impossible to reconcile this standard [negligence] with Article 30(1) [intent and knowledge] of the ICC Statute so that the question arises as to whether the deviation can be justified on the basis of the words "unless otherwise provided" in Article 30(1) of the ICC Statute. As there is no "colourable support" for the deviation in prior 502 case law the answer would appear to depend on whether the ICC Elements of Crimes can by themselves "provide otherwise". It is submitted that they cannot, though a sentence in the Elements' "General introduction" may be read to suggest the contrary.128

In Lubanga, the PTC I affirmed that the ICC Elements of Crimes can by themselves 'provide otherwise'.129 Lubanga was charged with conscripting and enlisting children under the age of fifteen years into armed forces, and using them to participate actively in hostilities, a crime punishable under articles 8 (2) (b) (xxvi) and 8 (2) (e) (vii) of the Statute. The third element of the Elements of Crimes assigns a negligent standard (should have known) with regard to the circumstance element (the age of the victim concerned) of these offences.130 Relying on the "unless otherwise provided" clause, the Pre-Trial Chamber considered this element of negligence, as set out in the Elements of Crimes of the above mentioned provisions, an exception to the 'intent and knowledge' standard provided in Article 30(1).131

As for the fifth element of the Elements of the Crimes for the crime under consideration, the Pre-Trial Chamber noted that this 'Element' requires only that 'the perpetrator was aware of the factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict', without going as far as to require that the accused conclude, on the basis of a legal assessment of the said circumstances, that there was an armed conflict.'132 The same applies mutatis mutandis to the crime of genocide by forcibly transferring children. It would be sufficient to demonstrate that the perpetrator was negligent regarding the 503 circumstance element, namely the fact that the victims forcibly transferred were under the age of 18 years.133

One might wonder whether such a lower standard of culpability (negligence) is sufficient for crimes that have a very specific object. "Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group", "using, conscripting or enlisting children into armed forces" and "compelling a prisoner of war to serve in the forces of a hostile power" are crimes, the very definition of which explicitly state the object against which certain acts are directed (i.e. children and prisoners of war).134 One might suggest that in such categories of crimes which have a very specific object, knowledge, as opposed to mere negligence, has to be assigned to the circumstance element. There is no provision in the Rome Statute which obliges the honourable judges of the ICC to apply the Elements of Crimes. The plain text of Article 9 states that these Elements of Crimes 'shall assist the Court in the interpretation and application of articles 6, 7, and 8.' However, the application of these Elements might infringe upon one of the most fundamental rights of the accused, namely, the presumption of innocence. It is up to the honourable judges of the ICC to decide on that issue and not to adhere to the approach adopted by the Pre-Trial Chamber I in the Lubanga case.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

Furthermore, the Elements of Crimes includes the following 'alien element' as an element of the crime of genocide: '[t]he conduct took place in the context of a manifest pattern of similar conduct directed against that group or was conduct that could itself effect such destruction.'135 If one considers this element as a 'circumstance element', it has to be covered by the default rule of Article 30 of the ICC Statute and, as consequence, the prosecution must prove that the perpetrator is aware that his proscribed conduct (i.e. of killing members of the group) 'took place in the context of a manifest pattern of similar conduct directed against that group or was conduct that could itself effect such destruction.'136

504 3.3 Article 30 vis-à-vis Individual Criminal Responsibility - Article 25

Article 25 of the ICC Statute which is entitled 'individual criminal responsibility' provides for various forms of perpetration and participation in a criminal conduct. Sub-paragraph (a) of paragraph 3 refers to three forms of perpetration. Yet, under the ICC Statute a person shall incur criminal responsibility if he or she commits any of the crimes within the jurisdiction of the ICC 'whether as (i) an individual, (ii) jointly with another, or (iii) through another person, regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible'.137

From a German criminal law perspective, element (i) speaks about unmittelbarer Täter (the direct perpetrator who physically carried out the material elements of the offence in person); element (ii) deals with Mittäterschaft (co-perpetration); and the third form of perpetration is concerned with mittelbarer Täter or Hintermann (indirect perpetrator, a person who acts through the agency of another). This latter form of perpetration was defined by the 1996 Preparatory Committee in the following words, '[a] person shall be deemed to be a principal where that person commits the crime through an innocent agent who is not aware of the criminal nature of the act committed, such as a minor, a person of defective mental capacity or person acting under mistake of fact or otherwise acting without mens rea. '138

3.3.1 Co-perpetratorship

The first test of the notion of co-perpetratorship as provided for in Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute was made by Pre-Trial Chamber 1, in the Lubanga case.139 There the Chamber agreed with scholarly opinions that the concept of co-perpetration is originally rooted in the idea that when the sum of the co-ordinated individual contributions of a plurality of persons results in the realisation of all the objective elements of a crime, any person making a contribution can be held vicariously responsible for the contributions of all the others and, as a result, can be considered as a principal to whole crime.140

505 The Chamber noted that 'the definitional criterion of the concept of co-perpetration is linked to the distinguishing between principles and accessories to a crime where a criminal offence is committed by a plurality of persons.'141 The Chamber realised that there are three different approaches to differentiate between principals and accessories to a crime, namely: (1) the objective approach (only those who physically carry out one or more of the objective elements of the offence can be considered principles to the crime)142 ; (2) the subjective approach adopted by the two ad hoc Tribunals through the concept of joint criminal enterprise which places the focus on the state of mind in which the contribution to the crime was made;143 and (3) the third approach - the one adopted by the Pre-Trial Chamber for distinguishing between principals and accessories - which relies on the concept of 'control over the crime'.144

According to the Pre-Trial Chamber 'this approach involves an objective element, consisting of the appropriate

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

factual circumstances for exercising control over the crime, and a subjective element, consisting of the awareness of such circumstances.'145 The Chamber asserted that the main feature of this concept is that 'principals to a crime are not limited to those who physically carry out the objective element of the offence, but also include those, who, in spite of being ... [remote] from the scene of the crime, control or mastermind its commission because they decide whether and how the offence will committed.'146 They are principals and not accomplices because they have, along with others, control over the offence by reason of essential tasks assigned to them.147

From a German criminal law perspective, the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber adhered to the notion of Mittäterschaft (co-perpetration) based on funktionelle Tatherrschaft (functional control over the crime). The Chamber, however, deviated from Professor Roxin's theory which restricted the notion of co-perpetration based on functional control over the crime for those who contribute to the commission of the crime at its execution stage.148 According to the 506 Chamber, those who contribute at the preparatory stage as well as at the execution stage fall within the ambit of co-perpetration as set out in Article 25(a) of the ICC Statute as long as the following objective and subjective elements are met:

(i) the existence of an agreement or common plan between two or more persons (objective element)149 ;

(ii) co-ordinated essential contribution by each co-perpetrator resulting in the realisation of the objective elements of the crime (objective element)150 ;

(iii) the fulfilment of the subjective element of the crime in question by the coperpetrators including any requisite dolus specialis or ulterior intent for the type of crime involved151 ;

(iv) the co-perpetrators must all be mutually aware and mutually accept that implementing their common plan may result in the realisation of the objective elements of the crime;

(v) the co-perpetrator must be aware of the factual circumstances enabling him to jointly control the crime.152

As far as the subjective elements are concerned, element (iii) can be satisfied if the co-perpetrator acted with any of the following mental states dolus directus of the first degree, dolus directus of the second degree, or dolus eventualis. These mens rea standards - as already discussed above - satisfy the threshold of the mental element embodied in Article 30 of the ICC Statute. However, in situations where the definition of the crime requires a specific intent, such as the case of persecution as a crime against humanity or genocide, the prosecution has to demonstrate that each co-perpetrator possesses such a specific intent.153

Element (iv) requires proof of 'double intent' on the part of the co-perpetrators, namely, a 'cognitive component' and a 'volitional component'. As to the former, it must be shown that all co-perpetrators, at the time when they agreed to start the implementation of their common plan, were mutually aware of the risk that such implementation may result in the realisation of the objective elements of the crime.154 As for the volitional component, it has to be proved 507 that all co-perpetrators 'mutually accept[ed] such a result by reconciling themselves with it or consenting to it.'155

The requirement of such a subjective element for the notion of co-perpetration based on joint control over the crime will inevitably stand against the application of any lower threshold than that of dolus eventualis. That is to say the negligence standard (should have known) assigned to the circumstance element (the age of the victim concerned) of the war crime of enlisting or conscripting children will not be applicable in the instant case.156

Element (v) is the third and last subjective element required for the notion of co-perpetration based on joint control of the crime. According to the Pre-Trial Chamber this element requires the accused to be aware

(i) that his or her role is essential to the implementation of the common plan, and hence in the commission of the crime, and

(ii) the he or she can - by reason of the essential nature of his or her task - frustrate the implementation of the common plan, and hence the commission of the crime, be refusing to perform the task assigned to him or her.157

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

3.3.2 Aiding and Abetting

Sub-paragraph (c) of Article 25(3) of the ICC Statute assigns a high threshold of mens rea for the aiders and abettors, 'which goes beyond the ordinary mens rea requirement within the meaning of Article 30.'158 Accordingly, Article 25(3)(c) limits the accomplice liability to instances in which there exists the purpose of promoting or facilitating the commission of the offence. If that is the case, the prosecution must demonstrate that the aider and abettor's conscious objective is to facilitate the commission of the crime.

It is worth pointing out that the phrase 'for the purpose of facilitating', as it appears in the very beginning of sub-paragraph (c), is borrowed from § 2.06(3)(a) of the Model Penal Code. The issue, whether a lower culpable mental state than that required for the 508 principal perpetrator should be assigned to the aider and abettor, was heavily criticised by the commentators of the Model Penal Code as 'incongruous and unjust'.159 They reaffirmed that 'the culpability level for the accomplice should be higher than that of the principal actor, because there is generally more ambiguity in the overt conduct engaged in by the accomplice, and thus a higher risk of convicting the innocent.'160

Reading Article 25(3)(c) together with Article 30, it was questioned whether the conjunctive formulation (intent and knowledge) provided in the latter provision runs directly counter to international jurisprudence that an aider and abettor 'need not share the same mens rea of the principal perpetrator (e.g. intent to kill), and that a "knowing participation in the commission of an offence" or awareness of the act of participation coupled with a conscious decision to participate" is sufficient.'161 The problem could be approached in two ways. The first approach is proposed by Piragoff in his commentary on Article 30 of the ICC Statute:

It is submitted that the conjunctive formulation has not altered this jurisprudence, but merely reflects the fact that aiding and abetting by an accused requires both knowledge of the crime being committed by the principal and some intentional conduct by the accused that constitutes the participation. Even if a strict literal reading of the conjunctive in paragraph 1 were made such that an accomplice must intend the consequence committed by the principal, the same interpretative result would occur. Article 30 para. 2(b) makes it clear that "intent" may be satisfied by an awareness that a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events. This same type of awareness can also satisfy the mental element of "knowledge", as defined in Article 30 para. 3. Therefore, if both "intent" and "knowledge" are required on the part of an accomplice, these mental elements can be satisfied by such awareness. Therefore, article 30 confirms the existing international jurisprudence.162

The second approach relies on recent judgments delivered by the two ad hoc Tribunals in which the Appeals and Trial Chambers demand some sort of volitional element in addition to the knowledge requirement.163 Yet, in the Oric case, it was held that aiding and 509 abetting must be intentional in the sense that 'the aider and abettor must have double intent, namely both with regard to the furthering effect of his own contribution and the intentional completion of the crime by the principal perpetrator.'164

As far as the objective elements of aiding and abetting are concerned, Schabas noted that Article 25(3)(c) 'does not provide any indication as to whether there is some quantitative degree of aiding and abetting required to constitute the actus reus of complicity.'165 In sum, while sub-paragraph (c) provides for relatively low objective requirements of aiding and abetting, it assigns a relatively high subjective threshold.166

3.3.3 Common Purpose

Unlike the Statutes of the two ad hoc Tribunals, the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court makes explicit reference to the theory of 'group criminality' (common purpose). Sub-paragraph (d) of Article 25(3) of the ICC Statute introduces the concept of 'common purpose', as a punishable mode of criminal conduct in the following words:

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

In any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose. Such contribution shall be intentional and shall either:

(i) Be made with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group, where such activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; or

(ii) Be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime.167

The first words of Article 25(3)(d) have been subject to different interpretations. The words '[i]n any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such crime' was viewed by Professor Albin Eser as well as the Lubanga PTC as providing for a 510 'residual form of accessory liability'.168 Aware that Article 25(3)(d) of the ICC Statute provides for secondary participation as opposed to perpetration, the ICC Prosecutor, in the Document Containing the Charges in the Lubanga case, submitted that 'common purpose' could properly be considered as a third applicable mode of criminal liability.'169 Yet if that is the case, 'common purpose' as provided for in Article 25(3)(d) will always be the last resort for the ICC Prosecutor and will not be his "darling notion" as in the case of joint criminal enterprise in the jurisprudence of the Yugoslavia and Rwanda Tribunals. Whether the International Criminal Court will adhere to such interpretation by its PTC I, or whether it will interpret "common purpose" in the same way as it is interpreted under the jurisprudence of the two ad hoc Tribunals, is yet to be ascertained.

It might be held that 'common purpose' as a mode of criminal participation under Article 25(3)(d) will be appropriate to apply in situations which Professor Cassese named 'liability for participation in an institutionalized common criminal plan'.170 He states:

Plainly, in an internment camp where inmates are severely ill-treated and even tortured, not only the head of the camp, but also his senior aides and those who physically inflict torture and other inhumane treatment are responsible. Also those who discharge administrative duties indispensable for the achievement of the camp's main goals (for example, to register the incoming inmates, record their death, give them medical treatment or provide them with food) may incur criminal liability. They bear this responsibility so long as they are aware of the serious abuses being perpetrated (knowledge) and willingly take part in the functioning of the institution. That they should be held responsible is only logical and natural; by fulfilling their administrative or other operational tasks, they contribute to the commission of crimes. Without their willing support, crimes could not be perpetrated. Thus, however marginal their role, they constitute an indispensable cog in the murdering machinery.171

As noted above, Article 21 of the ICC Statute establishes a hierarchy of applicable law to be applied by judges of the International Criminal Court. According to Article 21(1)(a) of the ICC Statute, the Court shall apply in the first place its Statute,172 and in the second 511 place 'applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of international law of armed conflict.'173 It is undeniable that the International Criminal Court will resort to the symmetric jurisprudence of the Yugoslavia and Rwanda Tribunals in order to shape this mode of 'group criminality' under Article 25(3)(d). However, the ICC will encounter a legal dilemma if it adopts literally the three categories of joint criminal enterprise as developed in the case law of two ad hoc Tribunals.174 This difficulty stems from the fact that the subjective elements provided for in Article 25(3) sub-paragraphs (d)(i) (aim of furthering the criminal activity of the group) and (d)(ii) (knowledge of the intention of the group) will stand up against any application of the 'extended form' of joint criminal enterprise (JCE III).175

3.4 Article 30 vis-à-vis Superior Responsibility - Article 28

Article 28 of the ICC Statute sets forth two different levels of culpability regarding military and civilians commanders. As for the military commanders, or persons effectively acting as military commanders, Article 28(a)(i) of the ICC Statute assigns both actual knowledge (knew) or constructive knowledge (should have known).512 The term 'should have known' which is akin to negligence - a type of legal fault not necessarily involving a mental state - differs from the language employed in Articles 7(3)/6(3) of the ICTY/ICTR Statutes. There, the term 'had reason to know' is set out as a second alternative of knowledge which has to be proved on the part of the commander. It appears that the drafters of the ICTY/ICTR Statutes unlike those of the ICC Statute have carefully read the travaux préparatoires of Article 86 (then Art. 76 - Failure to Act) of Protocol I to the 1949 Geneva Conventions. During the preparatory work of the first Additional Protocol many delegations expressed their concerns regarding the inclusion of the phrase 'should have known' in then Article 76.176 Syria submitted an amendment suggesting the deletion of the phrase 'should have known'.177 This was endorsed by the delegation of Argentina who drew the working group's attention to the fact that 'penal responsibility should be interpreted in a very clear sense' and that the phrase 'should have known', as it appears in the ICRC draft, 'introduced a lack of clarity with regard to the conduct of superiors'.178 He concluded by saying that the phrase 'would be tantamount to reserving the responsibility for submitting proof, which would be incompatible with the presumption of innocence common to all Latin American legal systems'.179

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

At the Rome Conference, and as far as the requisite mens rea for command responsibility was concerned, the United States submitted a proposal in which it distinguished between the levels of culpability required for military commanders and civilian superiors:

An important feature in military command responsibility and one that was unique in a criminal context was the existence of negligence as a criterion of knew or should have known that the forces under his control were going to commit a criminal act. ... The negligence standard was not appropriate in a civilian context and was basically contrary to the usual principles of criminal law responsibility.180

513 Israel supported the United States' proposal in principle, but suggested the insertion of the words 'or ought to have known' after 'knew' in subparagraph (b)(i) of article 25 as set out in the Preparatory Committee's 1998 draft statute.181 In the view of the Israeli delegate, this would establish 'the principle that a superior not only had actual knowledge but also what he would term "constructive"' knowledge, in other words, being equally responsible for failing to appreciate facts which he or she was in a position to know.'182

Recent jurisprudence of the Yugoslavia and Rwanda Tribunals has stressed that 'criminal negligence is not a basis of liability in the context of criminal responsibility.'183 These evolutionary developments in the law of command responsibility were endorsed by PTC I in Lubanga. In discussing the Elements of war crime of using, conscripting or enlisting children, the Pre-Trial Chamber considered the jurisprudence of the two ad hoc Tribunals and concluded that the expression 'had reason to know' is stricter than the one of 'should have known' because the former 'does not criminalize the military superior's lack of due diligence to comply with their duty to be informed of their subordinates' activities.'184 Rather the 'had reason to know' requirement 'can be met only if military superiors have, at the very minimum, specific information available to them to the need to start an investigation.'185 Accordingly, 'a superior will be criminally responsible through the principles of superior responsibility only if information was available to him which would have put him in notice of offences committed by subordinates.'186 Thus, one might discern that neglect of a duty to acquire such knowledge, does not feature in the provision of Article 28(1) as a separate offence, and a superior is not therefore liable under 514 the provision for such failures but only for failing to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent or to punish.187

In light of the aforementioned, and reading Article 28(a) together with Article 30(3), it appears that while the first alternative of knowledge assigned to the military commander would meet the knowledge standard, the second alternative (should have known) would not. In such a situation the proviso 'unless otherwise provided' will come into play and the second alternative of Article 28(a) 'should have known' would prevail.

Paragraph 2 of Article 28 assigns a recklessness standard (consciously disregard information) with regard to the civilian superiors. This language is akin to the Model Penal Code § 2.02(2)(c). It is observed that the requirement that the actor consciously disregard the risk is the most significant part of the definition of recklessness under the Model Penal Code. It is this concept which differentiates a reckless actor from a negligent one.188 The negligent actor is a person who fails to perceive a risk that he ought to perceive. The reckless actor is a person who perceives or is conscious of the risk but disregards it.189 Hence, in many offences where the law provides that recklessness is the minimum level of culpability, negligence will not suffice. Accordingly, 'the distinction between 'conscious disregard' and 'failure to perceive' will often signify the difference between conviction and acquittal.'190

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

3.5 Article 30 vis-à-vis Mistake of Law and Mistake of Fact Article 32 of the Rome Statute is the first provision ever in the sphere of international criminal law which expressly recognises mistakes either of fact or law as grounds of excluding criminal responsibility. It is worth noting that the Nuremberg and Tokyo Charters, as well as the Statutes of the two ad hoc Tribunals, lack a general provision on the subject.

Paragraph 1 of Article 32 recognises the well-established principle ignorantia facti excusat. It provides that 'a mistake of fact shall be ground for excluding criminal responsibility only if it negates the mental element required by the crime.'191 While the first sentence of the second paragraph of Article 32 reiterates the Latin maxim ignorantia juris non excusta, the second sentence of the same 515 paragraph assures 'a mistake of law may, however, be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility if it negates the mental element ...'192 In his commentary on Article 32 Triffterer had this to say:

The difference between mistake of fact and mistake of law is that in principle in the latter case the perpetrator is not mistaken about the existence of a (purely) material element of fact; therefore, mistakes about legal aspects of a crime in general do not touch the material elements or material prerequisites for justification or excuse.'193

On closer inspection, one might consider Article 32(1) to be superfluous as long as the default rule of Article 30(1) of the ICC Statute stands as a safeguard for excluding the criminal responsibility in situations where the material elements of a particular crime are not committed with intent and knowledge. But in situations where the factual or circumstantial elements of a particular crime are satisfied by a lower threshold than that of intent and knowledge (i.e. negligence) a defence of mistake of fact will not come into play. That is to say that all crimes within the subject matter jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court which in their elements contain the phrase 'should have known' (i.e. Elements of Crimes of article 8(2)(b)(xxvi) and 8(2)(e)(vii)) will stand against the defence of mistake of fact. This might be the reason why Lubanga refrained from claiming error regarding the age of the victim concerned, and instead raised the defence of mistake of law.

The first test of Article 32(2) - mistake of law - was conducted by the PTC I in the Lubanga case. There the Defence argued that Lubanga was unaware that voluntarily or forcibly recruiting children under the age of fifteen years entailed his criminal responsibility under the ICC Statute since the law was not 'accessible' or 'foreseeable' for Lubanga by that time.194 Schabas noted that 'although the argument was framed as one of retroactivity, it looks more like a claim of ignorance of the law.'195

The PTC I observed that 'the scope of a mistake of law within the meaning of Article 32(2) is relatively limited.'196 The Chamber went 516 further asserting that in the absence of a plea under Article 33 of the ICC Statute, 'the defence of mistake of law can succeed under Article 32 of the Statute only if Thomas Lubanga Dyilo was unaware of a normative objective element of the crime as a result of not realising its social significance (its everyday meaning).'197 Professor Thomas Weigend disagreed with PTC I. His fruitful explanation on the subject merits lengthy quotation: 'Normative terms, such as 'conscripting or enlisting', by definition have no 'everyday meaning' that some one could 'realise'. To have the required intent, all the actor needs to understand is what the normative term in question signifies. In casu, if Lubanga knew that 'conscripting or enlisting', although referring to a body of military law that he may or may not have been aware of, covers all forms of accepting the military service of young persons, then he knew enough to commit the offence with intent.'198 He continued: 'All that Article 32(2) ICC Statute does is to equate the misconception of a normative element (such as 'conscripting or enlisting') of an offence with the misconception of a factual element (such as 'under the age of 15 years').' In either case, Weigend continued, 'the defendant cannot be convicted if he was unaware that his conduct met the definition of the offence, either because he thought that the young recruits were 16 years old (factual mistake) or that he did not 'conscript or enlist' anyone because these technical terms, in his mind, only covered forcible recruitment (normative mistake).199

IV. CONCLUSION

This study reveals the dominant character of the mental element - Article 30 - within the Statute of the International Criminal Court. Since its integration into the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Article 30 has been subject to different interpretations by legal scholars and commentators. However, one of the major advantages of Article 30 is that it assigns different levels of culpability to each of the material element of the crimes under the subject matter jurisdiction of the Court - element analysis as opposed to offence analysis. Thus, the general rule under this provision is the full coverage of the material elements by the corresponding mental elements.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

At present, the only decision rendered by the International Criminal Court on substantive issues, since its creation on 1 July 517 2002, shed some light on the meaning of intent (dolus) despite some shortcomings.200 As for the mens rea standards under Article 30 of the ICC Statute, the Lubanga PTC I interpreted that provision to include the three categories of dolus, namely dolus directus of the first and second degrees and dolus eventualis.

Our examination also reveals that there are exceptions regarding the application of the default rule of intent and knowledge to the crimes within the ratione materiae of the International Criminal Court. The Lubanga Pre-Trial Chamber has affirmed that the ICC Elements of Crimes can by themselves "provide otherwise". The Chamber considered that the fault element of negligence, as set out in the Elements of Crimes for particular offences, can be an exception to the intent and knowledge standard provided in Article 30(1) of the ICC Statute.201 In such situations, where conviction depends upon proof that the perpetrator had 'reasonable cause' to believe or suspect some relevant fact, the prosecution has not much to do and the burden of proof, arguably, will lie upon the defendant. Such practice will inevitably infringe one of the most fundamental rights of the accused, namely the presumption of innocence. One might recall paragraph 3 of Article 66 of the ICC Statute which stipulates: 'In order to convict the accused, the Court must be convinced of the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt'.202 Denying such a fundamental principle which is well founded in Islamic law nearly 1400 years ago is considered one step backward for the future of international criminal justice. The Prophet once said: 'eliminate the prescribed punishments whenever it is possible: and if you can manage a dismissal of a Muslim [the accused] do it. It is better for Imam [judge] to be mistaken in pardon than to be mistaken in penalty.'203 Islamic jurists (scholars) gave this rule a great importance, as it is corresponding to the spirit of the Islamic Shari'a regarding protection of a person from harm and observation of his interest.204

518 At present, mens rea or the mental element - the most significant factor in determining criminal responsibility - is still one of the most complex areas of international criminal law, in most part because so many imprecise and vague terms have been used to define this fault element. Suffice to say that in many cases the conviction or acquittal of an accused appearing before the ICC will depend on the interpretation of Article 30 and its relationship with other provisions in the ICC Statute. At present, numerous judgments rendered by national and international courts have paved the way for a better understanding of the complex notion of mens rea in the sphere of international criminal law.205 It is now up to the International Criminal Court to illuminate it.

Lecturer in Law, Brunel Law School, Brunel University, London; Judge, Egyptian Ministry of Justice (2002-2007); Senior Public Prosecutor, Egyptian Ministry of Justice (1997-2002). PhD (Irish Centre for Human-NUI Galway, Ireland); LLM (Irish Centre for Human Rights-NUI Galway, Ireland); Dip. in International Legal Relations (Ain-Shams University, Cairo); LLB & Bachelors of Police Sciences (Cairo). My own thinking on this work has been significantly influenced by Roger Clark's influential article on The Mental Element in International Criminal Law: The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Elements of Offences, 12 CRIM L. FORUM 291 (2001). The author would like to thank Prof. William Schabas and Prof. Michael Bohlander for their valuable comments on an early draft of this work. Special thanks for Dr. Nora Karsten of the ICTY and Dr. Noelle Higgins of the Dublin City University for their comments on the final draft.

---

1. Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Case No. ICC-01/04-01/06-803, Décision sur la confirmation des charges, (Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges), 29 January 2007.
2. Ibid.
3. For the drafting history of Article 30 of the ICC Statute see Roger S. Clark, The Mental Element in International Criminal Law: The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Elements of Offences, 12 CRIM L. FORUM 291 (2001).
4. Rome Statute, Article 30.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

5. See Erkin Gadirov and Roger Clark, Article 9 - Elements of Crimes, in COMMENTARY ON THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: OBSERVERS' NOTES, ARTICLE BY ARTICLE, 505-529 (Otto Triffterer, ed., 2nd edn., 2008) at 513. As a result of the omission of the earlier draft of then Article 28 on actus reus 'causation' can hardly be seen as a requisite material element in the Statute (ibid). For more details on the element of causation see ibid at 521-522. See also Otto Triffterer, Causality, as a Separate Element of the Doctrine of Superior Responsibility as Expressed in Article 28 Rome Statute ?, 15 LJIL 179 (2002). See also Donald k. Piragoff and Darryl Robinson, Article 30 - Mental Element, in COMMENTARY ON THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: OBSERVERS' NOTES, ARTICLE BY ARTICLE, 849 (Otto Triffterer, ed., 2nd edn., 2008) at 851-852.
6. Section 1.13(10) of the Model Penal Code. For more information on the Model Penal Code, see Herbert Wechsler, Codification of the Criminal Law in the United States: The Model Penal Code, 68 COLUM L. REV. 1425 (1968); Herbert Wechsler, The Challenge of A Model Penal Code, 65 HARV. L. REV. 1097 (1952). See also Jerome Hall, The Proposal to Prepare a Model Penal Code, 4 JOURNAL OF LEGAL STUDIES 91 (1951-1952). For the recent work by the American Law Institute on the MPC, see AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE, MODEL PENAL CODE AND COMMENTARIES, (The American Law Institute, 1985). As for the definition of material elements in the German literature particularly, what so called the theory on negative legal elements of the offence or 'Lehre von den negativen Tatbestandsmerkmalen ', see VOLKER KREY, Deutsches Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil, Vol. 2, (2003) at 15, 17.
7. Kelt and von Hebel used the phrase 'material elements and the principle of mens rea coverage' instead of 'element analysis', see Maria Kelt and Herman von Hebel, General Principles of Criminal Law and the Elements of Crimes, in THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: ELEMENTS OF CRIMES AND RULES OF PROCEDURE AND EVIDENCE, 19-40 (Roy Lee ed., 2001).
8. See the AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE, MODEL PENAL CODE AND COMMENTARIES, Vol. 1, (The American Law Institute, 1985). It is worth pointing out that within United States there are fifty-two American criminal codes, and it is often difficult to state 'the American rule on any point of criminal law'.
9. Model Penal Code and Commentaries, § 2.02, supra note 6, at 229, n. 1.
10. Model Penal Code, § 2.02(4).
11. Elements of Crimes, U.N. Doc. ICC-ASP/1/3, 1st Sess., Official Record (adopted by the Assembly of States Parties on September 9, 2002).
12. Rome Statute, Article 30(2)(a).
13. Rome Statute, Article 30(2)(b).
14. Rome Statute, Article 30(3).
15. Piragoff and Robinson, Article 30 - Mental Element, supra note 5, at 852-853.
16. See the very recent and challenging discussion on the subject by Kevin Jon Heller, Mistake of Legal Element, the Common Law, and Article 32 of the Rome Statute, A Critica Analysisl, 6 JICJ 419 (2008).
17. See footnote 15.
18. Ibid., at 853.
19. Ibid.
20. See footnote 11.
21. Piragoff and Robinson, Article 30 - Mental Element, supra note 5, at 853. Maria Kelt and Herman von Hebel, What Are the Elements of Crimes?, in THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: ELEMENTS OF CRIMES AND RULES OF PROCEDURE AND EVIDENCE, 13-18 (Roy Lee ed., 2001): 'there was considerable debate [during the negotiations of the elements of crimes] as to whether they [the contextual elements] really were "material elements" - and if so whether they were (fully) covered by the mental element of article 30 - or whether they formed a separate type of element. Some participants thought, for example, that there might be a category of elements that are neither material nor mental, but which should be considered "jurisdictional" or "merely jurisdictional". Ultimately, however, an explicit decision as to whether these elements were "material elements" became unnecessary, as for each contextual element some corresponding mental element [however, lower than that provided for under Article 30] was specified in most cases, which, as a result, [...] rendered the other question moot'.
22. See Prosecutor v. Tihomir Bla%24skic, (Case No. IT-95-14-A) Judgment, July 29, 2004, para. 41. See also Prosecutor v. Naser Oric, Case No. IT-03-68-T, Trial Judgment, 30 June 2006 (Oric Trial Judgment), para. 279.
23. See JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW, (3rd edn., 2001) at 119; See also GLANVILLE WILLIAMS, CRIMINAL LAW: THE GENERAL PART, §§ 16, 18 (2nd edn., 1961).
24. See footnote 12.
25. See footnote 13.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

26. Clark, The Mental Element in International Criminal Law, supra note 3, at 303, n. 38.
27. As suggested by Piragoff and Robinson, Article 30 - Mental Element, supra note 5, at 859; Gerhard Werle and Florian Jessberger, 'Unless Otherwise Provided' - Article 30 of the ICC Statute and the Mental Element of Crimes under International Criminal Law, 3 JICJ 35 (2005) at 41; Albin Eser, Mental Elements, in THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: A COMMENTARY (Antonio Cassese et al. eds., 2001) at 913.
28. Clark, The Mental Element in International Criminal Law, supra note 3, at 303, n. 39.
29. Piragoff and Robinson, Article 30 - Mental Element, supra note 5, at 859.
30. United States v. Hilliard, 31 F.3d 1509 (10th Cir. 1994).
31. See Michael Duttwiller, Liability for Omission in International Criminal Law, 6 ICLR 1 (2006) at 56-58.
32. Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, (Proceedings of the Preparatory Committee During March-April and August 1996), U.N. GAOR 51st Sess., Supp. No. 22, UN Doc. A/51/22 (1996) Vol. I, p. 45, and Vol. II, at 90.
33. Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, U.N. GAOR, 53rd Sess., U.N. Doc. A/AC.249/1998/CRP.7 (1998), pp. 64-65 (article) 28.
34. Piragoff and Robinson, Article 30 - Mental Element, supra note 5, at 858-859.
35. Eser, Mental Elements, supra note 27, at 912; See also footnote 29.
36. Gadirov and Clark, Article 9 - Elements of Crimes, supra note 5, at 515.
37. Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges, supra note 1, paras. 351-355. In the present case, Pre-Trial Chamber I employed the phrase 'omissions' eight times while discussing Article 30 of the ICC Statute.
38. Judgment, Limaj (IT-03-66-T), Trial Chamber, 30 November 2005, § 509 (emphasis added); Judgment, Krstic (IT-98-33-A), Appeals Chamber, 19 April 2004, § 188; Judgment, Kunarac (IT-96-23-T & IT-9623/1-T), Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, § 390; Judgment, Gacumbitsi (ICTR-2001-64-T, Trial Judgment, 17 June 2004, § 285 ("Committing" refers generally to the direct and physical perpetration of the crime by the offender himself"); Judgment, Kayishema (ICTR-95-1-A), Appeals Chamber, 1 June 2001, § 187; Judgment, Vasiljevic (IT-98-32-T), Trial Chamber, 29 Nov. 2002, § 62 ('The Accused will only incur individual criminal responsibility for committing a crime under Article 7(1) where is it is proved the he personally physically perpetrated the criminal acts in question or personally omitted to do something in violation of international humanitarian law'); Judgment, Kamuhanda (ICTR-99-54A-T), Trial Chamber, § 595 ('To commit a crime usually means to perpetrate or execute the crime by oneself or to omit to fulfil a legal obligation in a manner punishable by penal law.'); See also Judgment, Tadic (IT-94-1-A), Appeals Chamber, 15 July 1999, § 188; Judgment, Kunarac (IT-96-23-T & IT-9623/1-T), Trial Chamber, 22 February 2001, § 390; Judgment, Krstic (IT-98-33-T), Trial Chamber, 2 August 2001, § 601; Judgment, Krnojelac (IT-97-25-T), Trial Chamber, 15 March 2002, § 73. Judgment, Blagoje Simic (IT-95-9-T) Trial Chamber, 17 October 2003, § 137 ('Any finding of commission requires the personal or physical, direct or indirect, participation of the accused in the relevant criminal act, or a finding that the accused engendered a culpable omission to the same effect, where it is established that he had a duty to act, with requisite knowledge.').
39. Model Penal Code, § 2.02(2)(a)(i).
40. United States v. Bailey et al., 444 U.S. 394; 100 S. Ct. 624; 62 L. Ed. 2d 575; U.S. Lexis 69, November 7, 1979, Argued, January 21, 1980, Decided, at 632; See also United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422, 445 (1978).
41. KREY, DEUTSCHES STRAFRECHT: ALLGEMEINER TEIL, supra note 6, at 109.
42. Cramer, in STRAFGESETZBUCH: KOMMENTAR, (Schönke and Schröder eds., 1997) at 263. (Absicht ... liegt nur dann vor, wenn der Handlungswille des Täters final gerade auf den vom Gesetz bezeichneten Handlungserfolg gerichtet war); LACKNER, Strafgesetzbuch, (München: Beck, 1991) 95. For more details on Vorsatz in German criminal law in the English language see Mohamed Elewa Badar, Mens Rea - Mistake of Law and Mistake of Fact in German Criminal Law: A Survey for International Criminal Tribunals, 5 ICLR 203 (2005).
43. Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges, supra note 1.
44. Ibid., para. 351.
45. Ibid.
46. Rome Statute, Chapeau element of Article 6: '... genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy ...'
47. Rome Statute, Article 7(2)(f): "'Forced pregnancy" means the unlawful confinement of a woman forcibly made pregnant, with intent of affecting the ethnic composition of any population ...'
48. Rome Statute, Article 7(2)(h): "'Enforced disappearance of persons" means the arrest, detention or abduc-

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

tion ... with the intention of removing them from the protection of the law for a prolonged period of time.'
49. See Mohamed Elewa Badar, Drawing the Boundaries of Mens Rea in the Jurisprudence of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, 6 ICLR 313 (2006) at 317-328.
50. Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges, supra note 1, para. 352.
51. Ibid.
52. As suggested by Werle and Jessberger, Unless Otherwise Provided, supra note 27, at n. 34.
53. See Otto Triffterer, The New International Criminal Law - Its General Principles Establishing Individual Criminal Responsibility, in THE NEW INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW, 639-727 (Kalliopi Koufa ed., 2003) at 706.
54. Eser, Mental Elements, supra note 27, at 915: "... the perpetrators being aware that the action will result in the prohibited consequence ... with certainty..."
55. Model Penal Code, § 2.02(2)(b)(ii).
56. For a thorough analysis of the notion of 'oblique intent' in the criminal law of England see Glanville Williams, Oblique Intention, 46 CAMBRIDGE LJ (1987) 417.
57. Ibid., at 420.
58. Ibid.
59. Ibid.
60. Buzzanga (1979) 49 C.C.C. (2d) 369 (Ont.C.A), per Justice Martin, quoted in DON STUART, CANADIAN CRIMINAL LAW: A TREATISE (2001) at 218-219. The relevant facts of the case as summarised by Stuart were as follows: The accused had been convicted ... of wilfully promoting hatred against the French Canadian public in Essex County. They had circulated an inflammatory handbill entitled 'Wake Up Canadians Your Future is At Stake'. The two accused, who identified with French Canadian aspirations and culture, denied intent to promote hatred. They were involved with a movement to establish a French language high school in Essex County. Their purpose was to dramatise how ridiculous the opposition had been and to prompt the government into quick intervention.
61. BGHSt 21, 283 (Vol. 21, at 283).
62. Eser, Mental Elements, supra note 27, at 914-915.
63. Antonio Cassese, The Statute of the International Criminal Court: Some Preliminary Reflections, 10 EJIL 158 (1999), at 153: 'While it is no doubt meritorious to have defined these two notions [intent and knowledge in Article 30], it appears questionable to have excluded recklessness as a culpable mens rea under the Statute.'; Johan D. Van der Vyver, The International Criminal Court and the Concept of Mens Rea in International Criminal Law, 12 MIAMI INT'L & COMP L. REV. 57-149 (2004), at 64-65: 'Antonio Cassese has criticized the ICC Statute for not recognizing "recklessness" as the basis of liability for war crimes. However, if one takes into account the resolve to confine the jurisdiction of the ICC to "the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole," it is reasonable to accept that crimes committed without the highest degree of dolus ought as a general rule not to be prosecuted in the ICC.'; Werle and Jessberger, Unless Otherwise Provided, supra note 27, at 41-42: 'This interpretation of Article 30(2)(b) and 3 ICCSt., which appears to be shared by most commentators, results in the establishment of a standard of mens rea apparently stricter than that usually applied by both domestic and international courts.' Werle and Jessberger, 'Unless Otherwise Provided', supra note 27, at 53: 'the requirements of the perpetrator's being aware that the consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events or of the perpetrator's meaning to cause that consequence (Article 30(2)(b) ICCSt.) excludes both forms of subjective accountability. It thus follows from the wording of Article 30(2)(b) that recklessness and dolus eventualis do not meet the requirement.'
64. Piragoff and Robinson, Article 30 - Mental Element, supra note 5, at 533-544; Hans H. H. Jescheck, The General Principles of International Criminal Law Set Out in Nuremberg, as Mirrored in the ICC Statute, 2 JICJ 38-55 (2004), at 45. Ferrando Mantovani, The General Principles of International Criminal Law: The Viewpoint of a National Criminal Lawyer, 1 JICJ 26-38 (2003), at 32: '...the ICC Statute's provision on the mental element (Article 30) appears to limit itself to intent (dolus) alone, thereby excluding negligence (culpa). Using ambiguous and psychologically imprecise wording ... It ... does include intent and recklessness (dolus eventualis) ...';
65. Clark, The Mental Element in International Criminal Law, supra note 3, at 301.
66. See R. v. G and Another [2004] 1 AC 1034 (HL).
67. DON STUART, CANADIAN CRIMINAL LAW, A TREATISE, supra note 60, at 224.
68. Sansregret v. The Queen, [1985] 45 C.R. (3d) 193, 203-204 (S.C.C.).
69. ibid.
70. U.S. v. Trinidad-Aquino, 259 F.3d at 1146.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

71. Model Penal Code, § 2.02(2)(c).
72. ibid.
73. United States v. Albers, 226 F. 3d 989, 995 (9th Cir. 2000).
74. United States. v. Albers, 226 F. 3d 989, 995 (9th Cir. 2000), citing Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 836-37 (1994) (emphasis added); see also United States. v. Trinidad-Aquino, 259 F.3d 1140, 1146 (9th Cir. 2001).
75. David M. Treiman, Recklessness and the Model Penal Code, 9 AM J CRIM LAW 281 (1981), at 351.
76. See FINBARR MCAULEY AND J. PAUL MCCUTCHEON, CRIMINAL LIABILITY (2000) 301-303.
77. Heribert Schumann, Criminal Law, in INTRODUCTION TO GERMAN LAW, (Werner F. Ebke and Matthew W. Finkin eds., 1996), at 389-390.
78. BGHSt 36, 1; 44, 99; BGH NStZ (Neue Zeitschrift fuer Strafrecht) 1999, p. 507; BGH NStZ 2000, 583.
79. JOHANNES WESSELS AND WERNER BEULKE, STRAFRECHT: ALLGEMEINER TEIL 76 (2002).
80. CLAUS ROXIN, STRAFRECHT: ALLGEMEINER TEIL, 376 (1997).
81. Ibid.
82. Prosecutor v. Milomir Stakic, Case No. IT-97-24-T, Trial Judgment, 31 July 2003 (Stakic Trial Judgment), para. 587.
83. Ibid.
84. Ibid.
85. The perpetrator could still be held criminally responsible and liable for being consciously negligent.
86. Ibid., para. 351.
87. Elewa Badar, Drawing the Boundaries of Mens Rea, supra note 49, at 313.
88. See footnote 50.
89. Ibid., para. 352 (emphasis added, footnotes omitted).
90. Ibid., paras. 353-354.
91. Ibid., para. 355.
92. In French criminal law, a distinction is made between two forms of intent, namely, dol général (general intent - to act unlawfully) and dol spécial which must be proved for certain offences. The term 'dol' in French criminal law means the deliberate intention to commit a wrong and involves both 'knowledge' that something is prohibited and the 'deliberate willingness' to carry out the proscribed conduct. The classic definition of dol général is provided by Emel Garçon, the eminent nineteenth century French criminal law scholar: "L'intention, dans son sens juridique, est la volonté de commettre le délit tel qu'il est déterminé par la loi; c'est la conscience, chez le coupable, d'enfreindre les prohibitions légales..." According to Garçon, dol général encompassed two mental elements: la conscience (awareness) and la volonté (willingness/desire). This definition of dol général was accepted by subsequent French legal scholars. The element of conscience, in French criminal law, simply refers to the accused's knowledge that he or she is breaking the law. This implies a similarity between the facts as understood by the perpetrator and as described in the criminal code. With regard to the element of 'desire', it is interpreted as simply referring to the accused's willingness to commit the wrongful act and not the desire to accomplish the result of the act in question. On French criminal law see JOHN BELL, SOPHIE BOYRON AND SIMON WHITTAKER, PRINCIPLES OF FRENCH LAW, (1998); BRICE DIKSON, INTRODUCTION TO FRENCH LAW, (1994); EMILE GARÇON, CODE PÉNAL ANNOTÉ (1st ed., 1901); Catherine Elliot, The French Law of Intent and Its Influence of the Development of International Criminal Law, 11 CRIM L. FORUM 36 (2000). R. MERLE AND A. VITUE, TRAITÉ DE DROIT PÉNAL (1997).
93. Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges, supra note 1, at n. 438. For different opinions on the concept of dolus eventualis see GEORGE FLETCHER, RETHINKING CRIMINAL LAW, (2000) at 445-446: (dolus eventualis entails 'a particular subjective posture towards the result'); See also Mihajlo Acimovic, Conceptions of Culpability in Contemporary American Law, 26 LA. L. REV. 28 (1965), at 48 (describing a Romanist law test according to which the perpetrator acted intentionally if he could have said to himself: It may be either so or different, it may happen either so or differently; anyhow I shall act.) For a different opinion see Paul T. Smith, Recklessness in Dolus Eventualis, 96 SOUTH AFRICAN LAW JOURNAL 81 (1979): (criticizing South African law to the extent that it interprets dolus eventualis as indifference rather than foresight).
94. Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges, Supra note 2 above, fn. 438.
95. Cassese, The Statute of the International Criminal Court, supra note 63, at 153-154.
96. Ibid., at 154.
97. Triffterer, 'The New International Criminal Law', supra note 53, at 706.
98. Kai Ambos, General Principles of Criminal Law in the Rome Statute, 10 CRIM. L. FORUM 1-32 (1999), at 21-22.
99. For an in depth analysis of the criminal intent in Islamic criminal law see MOHAMED ELEWA BADAR,

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

THE CONCEPT OF MENS REA IN INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW: THE CASE FOR A UNIFIED APPROACH (Hart Publishing, June 2009).

100. Compare Rome Statute, Article 30 (2) (b) and Article 30 (3).

101. See footnote 14.

102. Ibid.

103. Rome Statute, Article 7(1): 'For the purpose of this Statute, "crime against humanity" means any of the following acts when committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population, with the knowledge of the attack.'

104. Rome Statute, Article 7(1)(g).

105. Rome Statute, Articles 8(2)(b)(xxii), and Article 8(2)(e)(vi).

106. Contra see Prosecutor v. Sylvestre Gacumbitsi, Case No. ICTR-2001-64-A, Appeal Judgment, 7 July 2006, (Gacumbitsi Appeal Judgment) in which the prosecution argued that non-consent of the victim and the perpetrator's knowledge thereof should not be considered as constitutive elements of the offence that must be proved by the Prosecution.

107. Contra see the Model Penal Code § 2.02(7) which stretched the definition of knowledge with regard to the attendant circumstance to encompass 'awareness of high probability of the existence of a particular fact'.

108. Glanville Williams, Criminal Law: The General Part, supra note 23, at 159.

109. Rome Statute, Article 8(2)(b)(xxvi); Article 8(2)(e)(vii). It is to be noted that the latter Article incriminate the enlisting of children into "armed forces or groups". The reason is that this Article applied to war crimes committed in armed conflicts not of an international character.

110. Elements of Crimes, U.N. Doc. ICC-ASP/1/3, 1st Sess., Official Record (adopted by the Assembly of States Parties on September 9, 2002) reprinted in WILLIAM A. SCHABAS, AN INTRODUCTION TO THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT, (2004) 310. Article 8(2)(b) (xxvi) War Crime of using, conscripting or enlisting children. See Kelt and von Hebel, General Principles of Criminal Law and the Elements of Crimes, supra note 7, at 31.

111. Smith & Hogan, Criminal Law, (2005) at 109-110.

112. Elements of Crimes, Article 8(2)(b)(vii)-1, reprinted in Schabas, AN INTRODUCTION TO THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT, supra note 110, at 299.

113. Elements of Crimes, Article 8(2)(b)(vii)-2., reprinted ibid at 299.

114. Elements of Crimes, Article 8(2)(b)(vii)(3)-1, and Article 8(2)(b)(vii)(3)-2, reprinted ibid at 299 (emphasis added).

115. SCHABAS, AN INTRODUCTION TO THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT, supra note 110, at 108.

116. Rome Statute, Article 6(1).

117. Rome Statute, Article 7.

118. Rome Statute, Article 7 (2)(b), (emphasis added).

119. Rome Statute, Article 8. Other crimes provided for in the ICC Statute contains in their definition a subjective element, see Article 7(2) (e), (f) and (h); Article 8 (2) (b) (i), (ii), (iii), (iv), (ix), (xxiv) and (xxv), and Article 8 (2) (e) (i), (ii), (iii) and (iv).

120. See in general Werle and Jessberger, Unless Otherwise Provided, supra note 27. Piragoff hold the same opinion: 'The major significance of Article 30, however, is its affect on definitions that do not expressly specify a mental element. Although a particular definition of a crime may be silent as to the requisite mental element, Article 30 would import the mental elements of "intent and knowledge" as being the mental elements require in order to render an accused criminally responsible and liable for punishment for that particular crime.' See Donald D. Piragoff, Article 30 - Mental Element, in COMMENTARY ON THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: OBSERVERS' NOTES, ARTICLE BY ARTICLE, 527-535 (Otto Triffterer ed., 1999) at 531.

121. Ibid., at 531.

122. Ibid.

123. Ibid.

124. Margaret McAuliffe deGuzman, Article 21 Applicable Law, in COMMENTARY ON THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: OBSERVERS' NOTES, ARTICLE BY ARTICLE, 435 (Otto Triffterer ed., 1999) at 436-438.

125. Rome Statute, Article 21.

126. Adopted by the Preparatory Commission of the International Criminal Court in June 2000, see Report of the Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court. Finalized draft text of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (PCNICC/2000/1/Add.1); and Finalized draft text of the Elements of Crimes (PCNICC/2000/1/Add.2).

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

127. Rome Statute, Article 6 (e).
128. Claus Kress, The Crime of Genocide under International Law, 6 ICLR 461 (2006) at 485 (emphasis in original, footnotes omitted).
129. Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges, supra note 1, para. 356.
130. Ibid., para. 358. The Pre-Trial Chamber I observed that: 'The "should have known" requirement set forth in the Elements of Crimes - which is to be distinguished from the "must have known" or constructive knowledge requirement - falls within the concept of negligence because it is met when the suspect: i. did not know that the victims were under the age of fifteen years at the time they were enlisted, conscripted or used to participate actively in hostilities; and ii. lacked such knowledge because he or she did not act with due diligence in the relevant circumstances one can only say that the suspect" should have known" if his or her lack of knowledge results from his or her failure to comply with his or her duty to act with due diligence).'
131. Ibid., paras. 356-359.
132. Ibid., para. 360.
133. See the sixth element of the Elements of Crimes of Article 6(e) Genocide by forcibly transferring children. For more information on this specific crime see Kurt Mundorff, 2008, Working Paper: Other Peoples' Children: A Textual and Contextual Interpretation of the Genocide Convention, Article 2(e), The Selected Works of Kurt Mundorff, available at http://works.bepress.com/kurt_mundorff/3/, last visited June 22, 2008.
134. Erkin Gadirov, Article 9 - Elements of Crimes, in COMMENTARY ON THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: OBSERVERS' NOTES, ARTICLE BY ARTICLE, (Otto Triffterer ed., 1999) at 301-302.
135. See footnote 11, pp. 113-115.
136. ICC-ASP/1/3, Article 6(a) Genocide by killing.
137. Rome Statute, Article 25(3)(a), (letters added).
138. BASSIOUNI, THE LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: AN ARTICLE-BY-ARTICLE EVOLUTION OF THE STATUTE, (2005) at 200.
139. Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges, supra note 1, paras. 322-367.
140. Ibid., para. 326.
141. Ibid.
142. Ibid., para. 328.
143. Ibid., para. 329.
144. Ibid., para. 330.
145. Ibid., para. 331.
146. Ibid., para. 330.
147. Ibid., para. 332.
148. CLAUS ROXIN, TÄTERSCHAFT UND TATHERRSCHAFT, (2000) at 294, 299.
149. Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges, supra note 1, paras. 343-345.
150. Ibid., paras. 346-348.
151. Ibid., paras. 349-360.
152. Ibid., paras. 366-367.
153. Ibid., para. 349.
154. Ibid., para. 361.
155. Ibid.
156. Ibid., para. 365.
157. Ibid., paras. 366-367.
158. Kai Ambos, Article 25 - Individual Criminal Responsibility, in COMMENTARY ON THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: OBSERVERS' NOTES, ARTICLE BY ARTICLE, 435 743-769 (Otto Triffterer ed., 2008) at 757.
159. Model Penal Code and Commentaries, supra note 6, § 2.06 Comment at 312, at n. 42.
160. Ibid.
161. Piragoff and Robinson, Mental Element - Article 30, supra note 5, at 855.
162. Ibid.
163. Bla%24skic Appeal Judgment, supra note 22, para. 41.
164. Oric Trial Judgment, supra note 22, para. 288 (emphasis added, footnotes omitted).
165. William A. Schabas, General Principles of Criminal Law in the International Criminal Court Statute (Part

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

III), 6 EUR J CRIME CR L CR J 84 (1998), 95-98.
166. Ambos, 'Individual Criminal responsibility', supra note 158, 757. Eser arrived to the same conclusion, see Eser, Individual Criminal Responsibility, THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: A COMMENTARY, (Cassese et al. eds., 2002) at 801.
167. Rome Statute, Article 25(3)(d).
168. Eser, Individual Criminal Responsibility, supra note 166, at 802-804.
169. Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, case No. ICC-01/04-01/06-356, Document Containing the Charges, Article 61(3)(a), August 28, 2006, para. 20.
170. Antonio Cassese, The Proper Limits of Individual Responsibility under the Doctrine of Joint Criminal Enterprise, 5 JICJ 109 (2007), at 112.
171. Ibid.
172. See footnote 125.
173. Ibid.
174. The notion of joint criminal enterprise as adopted by the two ad hoc Tribunals has been a source of endless fascination for commentators, generating an enormous amount of literature: Allen O'Rourke, Joint Criminal Enterprise and Br##anin: Misguided Over-Correction, 47 HARV INTL L. J. 307 (2006); Antonio Cassese, The Proper Limits of Individual Responsibility under the Doctrine of Joint Criminal Enterprise, 5 JICJ 109 (2007); Allison Marston Danner and Jenny S. Martinez, Guilty Associations: Joint Criminal Enterprise, Command Responsibility, and the Development of International Law, 93 CAL L. REV. 75 (2005); Kai Ambos, Joint Criminal Enterprise and Command Responsibility, 5 JICJ (2007) 159; Mohamed Elewa Badar, "Just Convict Everyone!" 'Joint Perpetration: From Tadic to Stakic and Back Again, 6 ICLR 293 (2006); Kai Hamdorf, The Concept of a Joint Criminal Enterprise and Domestic Modes of Liability for Parties to a Crime: A Comparison of German and English Law, 5 JICJ 208 (2007); Jens David Ohlin, Three Conceptual Problems with the Doctrine of Joint Criminal Enterprise, 5 JICJ 69 (2007); Nicola Piacente, Importance of the Joint Criminal Enterprise Doctrine for the ICTY Prosecutorial Policy, 2 JICJ 446 (2004); Katrina Gustafson, The Requirement of an 'Express Agreement' for Joint Criminal Enterprise Liability: A Critique of Br##anin, 5 JICJ 134 (2007); Harmen van der Wilt, Joint Criminal Enterprise, Possibilities and Limitations, 5 JICJ 91 (2007); Elies van Sliedregt, Pathway to Convicting Individuals for Genocide, 5 JICJ 184 (2007).
175. For critical analysis of the third category of JCE, see Elewa Badar, supra note 174.
176. The travaux préparatoires of the first Additional Protocol is reproduced in four volumes and one supplement in the work of HOWARD S. LEVIE, PROTECTION OF WAR CRIMES: PROTOCOL I TO THE 1949 GENEVA CONVENTIONS, (1981). The Supplement appears in year (1985).
177. Proposed Amendment to Article 76 by Syrian Arab Republic, CDDH/1/74, 20 March 1974, Official Records, Vol. III, p. 328, in Levie, Protection of War Crimes, ibid., at 302.
178. Mr. Cerda (Argentina), CDDH/I/74, in Levie, ibid., at 306.
179. Ibid.
180. Proposal submitted by the United States (A/CONF.183/C.1/L.2) (emphasis added) reprinted in M. CHERIF BASSIOUNI, THE LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: SUMMARY RECORDS OF THE DIPLOMATIC CONFERENCE, (2005) paras. 67-68.
181. UN Doc. A/CONF 183/C.1/SR.1 (16 June 1998), Mr. Nathan (Israel), reprinted in Bassiouni, Summary Records of the Diplomatic Conference, ibid., at 78, para. 73.
182. Ibid.
183. Prosecutor v. Sefer Halilovic, Case No. IT-01-48-T, Trial Judgment, 16 November 2005, (Halilovic Trial Judgment) para. 71; Bla%24skic Appeal Judgment, supra note 22, para. 63; Prosecutor v. Ignace Bagilishema, Case No. ICTR-95-1A-A, Judgment 3, 3 July 2002, (Bagilishema Appeal Judgment), paras. 34-35.
184. Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges, supra note 1, n. 439.
185. Ibid.
186. Ibid.
187. Bla%24skic Appeal Judgment, supra note 22, para. 62.
188. David M. Treiman, Recklessness and the Model Penal Code, supra note 75, at 351.
189. Ibid.
190. Ibid.
191. Rome Statute, Article 32(1).
192. Rome Statute, Article 32(2).
193. Otto Triffterer, Article 32 - Mistake of Fact or Mistake of Law, in COMMENTARY ON THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: OBSERVERS' NOTES, ARTICLE BY

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

ARTICLE, 895-914 (Otto Triffterer, ed., 2nd edn., 2008) at 902 (italics in the original).
194. Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges, supra note 1, para. 304. See also Transcript, 26 November 2006.
195. WILLIAM A. SCHABAS, INTRODUCTION TO THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT, (3rd edn., 2007) at 230.
196. Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges, supra note 1, para. 305.
197. Ibid., paras. 315-316 (footnotes omitted).
198. Thomas Weigend, Intent, Mistake of Law, and Co-perpetration in the Lubanga Decision on Confirmation of Charges, 6 JICJ 471 (2008) at 476.
199. Ibid.
200. Ibid., at 482.
201. Lubanga Décision sur la confirmation des charges, supra note 1, paras. 356-359.
202. According to paragraph 2 of Article 66 'the onus is on the Prosecutor to prove the guilt of the accused.'
203. Sunan Al Tirmizi, Vol. 4, p. 25.
204. Abd El-Khaleq Ebn Al Mofaddal Ahmaddon, Qa'edat dar'e al hedood bel-Shobehat wa atharoha fi al fiqh al gena'ei al islami (The Rule of Eliminating Penalty on Suspicion Criterion and Its Role in Islamic Penal Jurisdiction), 7 CONTEMPORARY JURISPRUDENCE RESEARCH JOURNAL 7-75 (1995), at 9.
205. See MOHAMED ELEWA BADAR, THE CONCEPT OF MENS REA IN INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW: THE CASE FOR A UNIFIED APPROACH (Hart Publishing, June 2009).

END OF DOCUMENT

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

5903

JOURNAL OF INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL JUSTICE

VOLUME 7, NO. 1
MARCH 2009

CONTENTS

Editorial
S. ZAPPALÀ 1

Articles

Violence and Massacres — Towards a Criminal Law of Inhumanity?
M. DELMAS-MARTY 5

Finding the Best Epistemic Fit for International Criminal Tribunals: Beyond the Adversarial–Inquisitorial Dichotomy
J. JACKSON 17

Symposium

Hamdan: Is the Guantánamo Approach Falling Apart?

Foreword
S. ZAPPALÀ 41

Following Historical Precedent: An Argument for the Continued Use of Military Professionals as Triers of Fact in Some Humanitarian Law Tribunals
R.V. MEYER 43

The Hamdan Case and the Application of a Municipal Offence: The Common Law Origins of 'Murder in Violation of the Law of War'
J.C. DEHN 63

Workshop

The Media and International Criminal Justice

International Criminal Tribunals and the Media
M. SIMONS 83

AC

3277

5904

by the Germans in 1943. Many of the victims had been reported by the Soviets as exiled to Siberia.

Ukraine has its Lidice too, in the town of Zavadka, destroyed by the Polish satellites of the Kremlin in 1946.[13] Three times, troops of the Polish Second Division attacked the town, killing men, women and children, burning houses and stealing farm animals. During the second raid, the Red commander told what was left of the town's populace: 'The same fate will be met by everyone who refuses to go to Ukraine. I therefore order that within three days the village be vacated; otherwise, I shall execute every one of you.'[14]

When the town was finally evacuated by force, there remained only 4 men among the 78 survivors. During March of the same year, nine other Ukrainian towns were attacked by the same Red unit and received more or less similar treatment.

What we have seen here is not confined to Ukraine. The plan that the Soviets used there has been and is being repeated. It is an essential part of the Soviet programme for expansion, for it offers the quick way of bringing unity out of the diversity of cultures and nations that constitute the Soviet Empire. That this method brings with it indescribable suffering for millions of people has not turned them from their path. If for no other reason than this human suffering, we would have to condemn this road to unity as criminal. But there is more to it than that. This is not simply a case of mass murder. It is a case of genocide, of destruction, not of individuals only, but of a culture and a nation. If it were possible to do this even without suffering we would still be driven to condemn it, for the family of minds, the unity of ideas, of language and of customs that form what we call a nation that constitutes one of the most important of all our means of civilization and progress. It is true that nations blend together and form new nations — we have an example of this process in our own country — but this blending consists in the pooling of benefits of superiorities that each culture possesses.[15] And it is in this way that the world advances. What then, apart from the very important question of human suffering and human rights that we find wrong with Soviet plans is the criminal waste of civilization and of culture. For the Soviet national unity is being created, not by any union of ideas and of cultures, but by the complete destruction of all cultures and of all ideas save one — the Soviet.

13 On 10 June 1942, 172 males over the age of 16 years were liquidated, the women and children deported and the village of Lidice razed to the ground in reprisal for the assassination of the Nazi dictator of Moravia, Reinhard Heydrich. Zavadka Morokhivs'ka, Sianits'kyi povit, Lemkivshchyna, now Zawadka-Morochowska, in Poland.

14 From W. Dushnyck, Death and Devastation on the Curzon Line (note by R.L).

15 Lemkin had in mind the United States.

Modes of Participation in Crimes Against Humanity

The Hechingen and Haigerloch Case

We present here the English translation of two decisions of German courts in a case involving various defendants (one decision at the level of first instance, the other at that of appeal). Both decisions deal primarily with the issue of participation in crimes against humanity.

These decisions are among the many interesting judgments delivered by German courts between 1945 and 1966 on crimes allegedly committed by Germans during the World War II. The decisions we are presenting discuss many points: (a) the compatibility of Control Council Law No. 10 with the nullum crimen principle; (b) the value of superior orders; (c) the notion of persecution as a crime against humanity; (d) necessity as a defence. However, the most interesting feature of the judgments resides in their discussion of the possible criminal responsibility of those participants in mass criminality who are neither at the top (in that they plan, order, instigate, etc. or else fail to prevent and punish crimes) nor at the bottom (in that they materially perpetrate the killing, raping, extermination, etc.) but are rather intermediate participants who operate in a grey area. For these participants, it normally proves difficult to establish whether they are culpable and therefore bear criminal liability.

The Tribunal of Hechingen (a small town in Baden-Württemberg, about 60 kms south of Stuttgart) had to pronounce on the criminal liability of those implicated in the deportation of Jews in 1941–1942 from two towns in Germany (Hechingen and Haigerloch) to Theresienstad and then Auschwitz. The Tribunal found that a medical doctor, who had been charged with ascertaining whether the deportees were fit to travel, was not culpable. It found instead that the four other defendants were guilty of crimes against humanity. The major accused was a senior administrative and police official, who had passed on the deportation orders issued by the Gestapo and seen to it that they were implemented; the Tribunal found that he had aided and abetted the crime of persecution on racial or religious grounds (a crime against humanity under Control Council Law No. 10). The three remaining defendants (German women without any official status who, upon orders from the administrative authority, had searched Jewish women being deported, to find out whether they were holding valuables) were also found guilty as accessories to the same crime against humanity. Strikingly, the Court of appeal held instead that the three women were not guilty, both because they had played a subordinate role and because they were not aware of the illegality of what they were doing. Also, with regard to the main defendant, after

Journal of International Criminal Justice 7 (2009), 131–154 doi:10.1093/jicj/mqp003

© Oxford University Press, 2009. All rights reserved. For permissions, please email: journals.permissions@oxfordjournals.org his conviction by the Tribunal, the Court of appeal remitted the case to a lower court, issuing legal instructions clearly destined to lead to acquittal. In this respect, the appellate decision is part of a post-World War II trend of German superior judicial bodies to insist on circumstances excluding criminal responsibility and thereby acquit defendants convicted by lower courts. The same trend can also be seen in the 1946–1950 case law of the Italian Court of cassation; this court tended to find on many occasions that a number of justifications or excuses made non-punishable the war crimes that according to lower courts — normally assize courts pronouncing between 1946 and 1948 — Italians siding with the Germans had committed against Italian civilians or members of resistance movements.

3248

5905

a.c.

Tribunal (Landgericht) Hechingen, Judgment of 28 June 1947, Kls 23/47[1]

[. . .] On the basis of the trial and the hearing of the evidence, the following is established:

(a) The accused S., as then Landrat ['county president', senior administrative and police official of a Kreis, i.e. County, District] of Hechingen, received the order of 14 Augnst 1942 of the Stuttgart Head Office of the Gestapo [abbreviation of Geheime Staatspolizei, Secret State Police — the German text uses the full form throughout]. On 17 August 1942, he gave the mayors of Haigerloch and Hechingen the necessary instructions in writing for carrying out this order, in particular to have the Jews directed to 'deportation' and their luggage searched in the prescribed manner, and to ready these persons for transport on 19 August 1942. He further instructed persons officially subordinate to him to cooperate in the physical search of the persons to be deported; he gave this instruction to, among others, co-defendant Ms Ho., who carried it out on 19 August 1942 together with Mrs M., appointed for the purpose by the mayor of Haigerloch, in relation to the Jewish women concerned. These findings are based, to the extent that they relate to the accused Mr S., on his own statements; otherwise they result from the statements of co-defendant Ms Ho. The detail of how the physical search of the Jewish women by Ms Ho. occurred will be presented below in another context.

(b) A total of 138 people, 136 from Haigerloch and 2 from Hechingen, were affected by this fourth deportation. These 138 people were transported under police escort on 19 August 1942 from Haigerloch to Stuttgart, nine of the particularly infirm in road vehicles, the rest by rail. In Stuttgart they were brought to the Gestapo collecting point, and from there transported to Theresienstadt. Of the 138 people departed, only a single victim remained alive and returned to Haigerloch; all the others, it must be regarded as certain, either died or were killed during the deportation. Information on the circumstances in Theresienstadt has been provided by the testimony of Senior State Attorney Mr D. of Stuttgart.

1 A. Cassese (ed.), Iain L. Fraser (trans.), Justiz und NS-Verbrechen – Sammlung deutscher strafurteile wegen Nationalsozialistischer Tötungsverbrechen 1945-1966 (In German), Vol. 1 (Amsterdam: University Press Amsterdam, 1968) 471–493 (Lfd. Nr. 022). The pages of the original German text are indicated in square brackets.
On this case, see B. Burghardt, 'S and Others (the Hechingen and Haigerloch Deportation case)', in A. Cassese et al. (eds), Oxford Companion to International Criminal Justice (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009), at 896–897, where reference is also made to a third judgment by the district court of Tübingen.

Since during the deportation no consideration was given to age or illness or infirmity of those deported (from Kreis Hechingen, as already mentioned, nine severely ill people were deported to Theresienstadt, and among the other deportees, no less than 10 were over 80), some of the deportees were already dead by the time they reached Stuttgart, and others during the transport to Theresienstadt. Theresienstadt was a small town with a normal population of some 7,000 inhabitants; at times up to 60,000 Jews were accommodated there, in a way, as is obvious from these facts alone, that bespeaks contempt for any humanity. From Theresienstadt transports regularly went to the extermination camp at Auschwitz; of those who avoided the death camp, a large proportion died from diseases. Not even National Socialism, by the way, dared to admit the truth to the German people. To deceive the people, those deported to Theresienstadt were allowed to write postcards, the contents of which were admittedly under SS censorship, so as to create the false impression that things were bearable for the Jews in Theresienstadt. It is noteworthy, however, that Jews deported to the so-called Reichskommissariat Ostland [the Baltic States, plus part of eastern Poland and the western Soviet Union] or to the so-called Generalgouvernement [the bulk of occupied Poland] were allowed no mail, so that it is not the case that written communications from Jews deported there [479] ever reached Germany. It was still more despicable that it was faithfully misrepresented to some of the Jews deported to Theresienstadt that it was intended to set up a Jewish old people's home there, and that they were induced to use their illquid resources to conclude 'residential-care contracts'. In reality no such old people's home was ever created; nor, even, was the objective of concluding the 'residential-care contracts' to deprive those Jews in a seemingly harmless way of the residue of their assets; instead, all that was wanted was a way to deceive the German people about the true aim of the deportation and lie to them that there was humane treatment for the Jews, which neither took place nor was intended.

II. Overall Appraisal in Criminal Law[2]

(1) For the appraisal in criminal law of the Gestapo orders mentioned in the first section of the grounds of judgment and at the same time for the criminal appraisal of all those actions serving to execute those orders, Law No. 10 issued by the Allied Control Council on 20 December 1945 on the punishment of

2 'The judgments against S., Ho., K. and B. were not conclusive, being overruled by the judgment of 20 January 1948 by the Tübingen Court of Appeal (see below); the final verdict on S. was given by the Tribunal of Hechingen, see Lfd 089, the other three being freed by Tübingen Court of Appeal. [Note: the names were already abbreviated in the transcripts made available for publication.]

5279

5906

persons guilty of war crimes, crimes against peace and against humanity is applicable (Journal Officiel du Commandement en Chef Français en Allemagne No. 12 p. 84 ff), and in particular Article II of this Law, clause 1(c) which says 'Est considéré comme crime chacun des actes ci-après énumérés: Crimes contre l'Humanité- Atrocités et délits comprenant, sans que cette énumération soit limitative, l'assassinat, l'extermination, l'asservissement, la déportation, l'emprisonnement, la torture, le viol ou tous autres actes inhumains commis contre toute population civile et les persécutions pour des motifs d'ordre politique, racial ou religieux, que lesdits crimes aient constitué ou non une violation de la loi nationale du pays où ils ont été perpétrés.' ['Each of the following acts is recognized as a crime: Crimes against Humanity: Atrocities and offences, including but not limited to murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, imprisonment, torture, rape, or other inhumane acts committed against any civilian population, or persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds whether or not in violation of the domestic laws of the country where perpetrated.']

The Allied Control Council's power to enact such a law follows, according to the generally recognized rules of international law, from the fact that with the unconditional surrender of the German Armed Forces the entire State power, as regards both administration and legislation, on the territory of the German Reich passed unrestrictedly to the Allied Control Council. The provisions of the Third Section of the Hague Convention on the Laws and Customs of War of 18 October 1910 [sic] and of all the principles of international law that regulate the authority of the occupying power for the case where lawful authority has only de facto fallen into the hands of the occupier ('l'autorité du pouvoir légal ayant passé de fait entre les mains de l'occupant . . .'), are not applicable where this transition has, following general and unconditional surrender, come about not only de facto but also de jure.

Nor can it be objected against application of Law No. 10 passed by the Allied Control Council that this Law rendered punishable actions that at the time they were committed did not face punishment under German law. Since the essential object of punishment is retribution, the threat of punishment before commission of an act is not a requirement for imposing the punishment that necessarily follows from the concept and essence of punishment. The principles nullum crimen sine lege and nulla poena sine lege are merely maxims of law of the State [Maximen des Staatsrechts] and in particular of constitutional law based on considerations of equity and expediency [Billigkeits- und Zweckmässigkeitserwägungen]. Where these principles were incorporated in a country's constitution, as in the so-called Weimar Constitution of the German Reich of 11 August 1919 (Article 116), [480] this has no other significance than that an enactment of a criminal law conflicting with them must be regarded as a constitutional amendment and accordingly subjected to the impediments put in the way of constitutional amendments. The fact that even the Constitution of Württemberg-Hohenzollern currently in force provides (Article 17(1)) that 'punishments may be imposed only on the basis of laws that were in force during the time the act was committed' is no bar to the application of Law No. 10 passed by the Allied Control Council, if only because this constitution had neither the power nor the intention to set aside the acts of the Allied Control Council.

(2) Law No. 10 passed by the Allied Control Council is not only the applicable but also the sole and exclusive legal basis for the punishment of those actions which that Law designates as crimes.

(a) The provisions of the German penal code would not, if Law No. 10 passed by the Allied Control Council were not available, suffice to atone for crimes in need of atonement which are, according to the Allied Control Council's will, to be punished. There are numerous cases of mistreatment committed on political or racial grounds and therefore to be considered as acts of persecution for political or racial reasons, which can however be prosecuted under German law only on petition (§232 of the German Penal Code); these cases would remain unpunished were the injured party — perhaps because no longer alive — no longer able to petition for a prosecution. There are numerous cases of property damage committed for political or racial reasons and therefore to be considered as acts of persecution on political or racial grounds that can similarly be prosecuted under German criminal law only on petition (§303(3) of the German Penal Code); these cases too would often go unpunished failing a petition. Gross outrages would be unprosecutable as civil disorder (§125 of the German penal code) because they were committed with the knowledge and desire of the State authorities, whereas civil disorder presupposes acts of violence committed against the will of the State authorities. The taking by violence of property would not always fit the offence of robbery (§249 of the German Penal Code) because the perpetrators did not have the intention of appropriating the things taken for themselves but were acting in favour of the State. To fill these lacunae, Law No. 10 passed by the Allied Control Council was accordingly necessary. It follows, therefore that even in those cases where punishment on the basis of German criminal law would in itself be possible, Law No 10 replaces the relevant provisions of German criminal law.

(b) The axiomatic character of Law No. 10 adopted by the Allied Control Council in relation to German penal laws leads to the further conclusion that the provisions contained in the first (general) part of the German Penal Code are also not directly applicable to crimes falling under Control Council Law No. 10. Control Council Law No. 10 is not merely a law amending or supplementing the second (special) part of the German Penal Code, but even the general provisions of criminal law are, where Control Council Law No. 10 is to be applied, to be taken either from the Control Council Law itself (e.g. as regards aiding and abetting — Article II(2)(c); as regards denial or acceptance of certain grounds of mitigation — Article II(3)) or else, where there are no explicit provisions, to be supplemented from the meaning and purpose of the Law and having regard to generally recognized principles of criminal law (e.g. as regards assessment of the so-called plea of necessity).

(3) It is a fact of course but should, however, all the same be explicitly stated, that the accused S. cannot — as he has attempted — appeal to the fact that popular opinion at the time did not regard him as guilty or punishable, [481] and that even today popular opinion does not regard him as guilty or punishable.

3280

5907

The then popular opinion [Volksmeinung] was, and, since the wording and contents of the Gestapo orders were unknown to it, could only be, formed on the basis of very imperfect knowledge of the facts and circumstances. Additionally, popular opinion mostly assesses not by rational but by irrational criteria; feelings replace the intellect. By contrast, it is the right and duty of the Court to base its decision on objective considerations and not subjective associations. Anyone making much allowance for his feelings usually runs the danger of exonerating himself from observing the general and customary guilt and blurring the boundaries of law and morality; there must be no other access to the heart than through the intellect.

Today's popular opinion is, moreover, a poor and unsuitable judge simply because the German people, when it comes to National Socialism, is largely a judge in its own cause. It has rightly been said that we Germans all too readily withdraw into fate and tragedy (Ernst Robert Curtius), and it is admittedly always easier to present oneself as a victim of circumstances and seek the blame outside us instead of within us, to flee from reality into illusion. But it is a dangerous illusion to believe that the guilt that affects not just the seducer but the seduced can be avoided by the easy recourse of an appeal to sympathy, and anyone who promotes this illusion is doing the German people poor service in the court of humanity.

(4) The accused cannot justify themselves on the ground that they were following orders either. This is explicitly excluded by Article II(4)(b) of Control Council Law No. 10, and it should be noted that the legal idea contained in the Article has always had validity in German law. While officials, like the accused S., K. and Ho., are obliged to obey, they are not obliged to blind obedience. Even the German Civil Service Act of 26/1/1937 provides, in § 7(II), second sentence: 'An official must not follow an order the execution of which would recognizably to him run counter to the criminal laws.' It follows that officials must not follow a criminal order or criminal instruction. They are not only entitled but also obliged to test whether the order or instruction runs counter to the criminal laws. This regulation even applied to the former German Armed Forces, although every unit is very specially built upon discipline and obedience. For § 47 of the Military Penal Code (RGBl. 1926, p. 275) requires: 'If the execution of an order in service matters infringes a criminal law, then the superior giving the order is solely responsible. However, a subordinate obeying it is to be punished as an accessory where: 1) he exceeded the order as issued, or 2) it was known to him that the superior's order concerned an action that was aimed at a civil or military crime or misdemeanour.'

Even a soldier, then, ought not to execute an unlawful order; where he nonetheless followed it, he is answerable as a participant [Teilnehmer]. As already set out, the orders on the deportation of the Jews lacked all legal basis. The relevant Gestapo orders were thus unlawful and constituted the ordering of a criminal action, so that these instructions ought not, even according to the law then in force, to have been followed by the accused. Since they nonetheless executed these orders, the accused are punishable as participants [Teilnehmer] if it was known to them that the order concerned an action aimed at a crime or misdemeanour. [482]

III. The Accused S.

(1) The 'deportation' of the Jews resident in Kreis Hechingen ordered by the Gestapo and the simultaneous confiscation and seizure of those Jews' assets ordered by the Gestapo was persecution on racial grounds (persécution pour des motifs d'ordre racial) and thus a crime against humanity within the meaning of Article II(1)(c) of Control Council Law No. 10. They constituted that crime even if at the time the 'deportation' was ordered the intention did not yet exist to kill the deported Jews or allow them to perish.

The wording of the Gestapo orders allows no doubt as to this. The first order already stresses in its introductory words that the deportation is happening 'as part of purging all Europe of Jews'; a compulsory 'purge of Jews' and a 'persecution on racial grounds' directed against Jews are obviously only different terms for the same thing. The Gestapo's second order calls the 'deportation' ordered 'the start of the Final Solution to the Jewish question' and 'the last opportunity for the moment to purge the individual districts of Jews'. The reference to the 'final solution to the Jewish question' was totally accurate if we recall that National Socialism had from the outset taken the fight against Jewry as its task and carried on this fight with measures which grew harsher by the year.

Control Council Law No. 10 explicitly defines persecution on racial grounds as a crime against humanity irrespective of whether the persecution measures infringe the national law of the country in which the act was committed. It needs no proof as such whether the measures ordered by the Gestapo were covered at least formally by provisions of German law. Nonetheless, it is appropriate to state that those measures were objectively unlawful even under German law. For the 'deportation' of the Jews and the associated deprivation of their freedom there was not even apparent legal basis. While the seizure of assets was allegedly on a legal basis, namely in part the 11th Order under the Reich Citizenship Act, and in part the statutory provisions on the seizure of communist assets and on the seizure of assets of enemies of the people and of the State in the Acts of 26 May 1933 and 14 July 1933, the reference to these provisions was purely arbitrary. While the 11th Order under the Reich Citizenship Act provided that the assets of a Jew who 'took up ordinary residence abroad' were forfeit to the German Reich, this could according to the wording of those orders apply only to Jews who voluntarily shifted their ordinary residence abroad, but not also to Jews who were deported abroad against their will. The application of the Acts on the seizure of communist assets and the assets of the enemies of the people and the State to the deported Jews would have presupposed a trial and finding, for each individual deportee, that they had acted in a communist or 'hostile to people and State' fashion; no such trial or finding was even attempted, far less carried out.

3281

5908

Finally, the measures ordered by the Gestapo would not lose their nature as 'persecution on racial grounds' even if they were aimed at serving military ends, in particular, the defence of the country. There is a difference between what motivates an act and what end the act serves. Even if the 'deportation' of the Jews were supposed to have had military ends (something for which there is no established supporting fact), the fact remains that as an element in the fight against the Jews it constituted persecution on racial grounds. How far the seizure of assets may be supposed to have served military ends cannot moreover be seen at all. [483]

(2) The accused S., by executing himself in part the orders that reached him from the Gestapo and in part having them executed by people under him, participated in persecution on racial grounds and thus in a crime against humanity.

(a) Accused S. objectively, to be sure, acted neither as perpetrator (Täter) nor co-perpetrator (Mittäter) but as accessory (Gehilfe), since his participation was confined to executing the orders of the Gestapo in his capacity as Landrat of Kreis Hechingen, to the detriment of the Jews concerned, without departing from these orders on the basis of decisions of his own.

The consideration that the Gestapo orders would have been executed even if accused S. had not been involved in their execution, that is, the consideration that his participation was not causal for their success, does not exonerate the accused. The causality concept (Ursachenbegriff) in legal science is not — unlike that in natural science — mechanistically oriented, but teleologically, in the sense of the purpose of the legal system. Accordingly, no accessory can escape penal responsibility by showing that the main perpetrator (Haupttäter) could have carried out the act even without his assistance. In the great mechanism of the persecution of the Jews, every single cog was interchangeable at all times. Were one, given that fact, to seek to exclude the criminal responsibility of each interchangeable participant because of the absence of causality of his participation, then ultimately only the main perpetrators would be liable; all accessories would get off scot-free, even if they had acted on racial grounds, for even in the latter case their participation would, on a mechanistic view, not have been causal.

The accused S. has further appealed to the fact that it could not be within the intention of Control Council Law No. 10 to punish absolutely all participation in the carrying out of persecution of the Jews; for instance, a typist typing out the Gestapo deportation orders and posting them, or the driver of a locomotive pulling the train the deported Jews were to be transported by, could not be punishable. This consideration is just as wrong as the previous one, though in the opposite direction; while the previous consideration couched the concept of causality too narrowly, it is now too broad. From the impunity of participation by a typist or train driver, the impunity of the Landrat's participation does not follow; to that extent, his argument does not prove what it is supposed to prove. The range of duties (Pflichtenkreis) of a typist or train driver is quite different from a Landrat's. A typist's official duty is fulfilled in her accurately and punctually typing what she is asked to; a train driver's in bringing the rail transport punctually and safely to its destination; neither the one nor the other commits a breach of duty if their activity happened to be part of the persecution of the Jews. Things are quite different with a Landrat. As the senior administrative and police official of the Kreis, he is entrusted with the administrative and police protection of its population against unlawful interference with their liberty and property; he infringes his set of duties if he participates in interference with the very legal goods he is called on to protect.

The question whether accused S. committed a continuous action or is punishable for four separate actions is one the Court felt it need not go into in its guilty verdict. It here followed the Nuremberg judgment of 30 September/1 October 1946, which for those accused (for instance accused X [sic]) found guilty on several counts applied a single punishment, and did not act pursuant to § 74 of the German Penal Code.

(b) In subjective respects, the punishability of accused S. depends on [484] his having acted intentionally as an accessory. Intent as an accessory (Gehilfenvorsatz) requires, first, that the accused knew what act he was furthering by his participation; he must have been aware that the actions ordered from him by the Gestapo served persecution on racial grounds. He had this awareness, as the Court hereby finds, as the outcome of the trial and taking of evidence, on the basis of the wording and content of the Gestapo orders he received, even if, as he has credibly assured, he did not reckon on the possibility that the deported Jews might be killed. The accused may also be believed to have assumed that the forced deportation of the Jews was in the interest of the defence of the Reich, and that he formed a too favourable conception of the fate awaiting the Jews after deportation ('resettlement') and was strengthened therein by hopes expressed by some of the Jews concerned themselves. The fact nonetheless remains that the forced deportation of the Jews as such, taken together with the confiscation and seizure of their assets, was seen by the accused as 'persecution on racial grounds'. The accused himself stated at the trial that he regarded the Gestapo measures as 'unjust' to the Jews, and struggled with himself whether to carry out the measures or not; these statements by the accused himself enable and support the finding made above.

Intent as an accessory (Gehilfenvorsatz) requires, second, that the accused knew that through his participation he was furthering the principal act. He had this awareness too, as the Court hereby finds, as an outcome of the trial and taking of evidence. This awareness is not excluded by the consideration brought up by the accused that if he himself had refused to execute the Gestapo measures someone else would have carried them out in his place, but on the contrary shown to be present; for this consideration shows that the accused took it upon himself, for reasons the scope of which is still to be discussed, to carry out the Gestapo orders himself instead of leaving it to someone else.

Intent as an accessory does not, by contrast, require the accused himself to have acted from racial considerations or from inhumane attitudes at all. Nor is it required that the accused had an awareness of the illegality of his action, since Control Council Law No. 10 declares persecution on racial grounds punishable irrespective of whether it infringes the national law of the country in which it was committed; it is thus immaterial what notion the person had as to the legality of his actions. That, finally, the fact that the accused was acting on orders does not exclude penal responsibility as an accessory is explicitly stated in Article II(4)(b) of Control Council Law No. 10.

3282

5909

(3) It remains to be discussed whether accused S. can appeal to grounds excluding guilt or punishment.

(a) Accused S. has asserted that he weighed against each other the facts that he could not prevent the carrying out of the Gestapo measures; that these measures would be carried out all the same even if he refused to do so; that his participation in these measures would accordingly not spare any of the Jews concerned the evils threatening them; and on the other the facts that his participation in these measures enabled him to remain in his post as Landrat, that his remaining in office was both in the interest of the Jewish population to the extent that he could mitigate some things, and in the interest of the non-Jewish part of the population with a negative attitude to National Socialism, in so far as he could uphold or procure facilitations for this part of the Kreis population too; from this weighing up, he had arrived at the conclusion that preponderant interests justified his carrying out, in order to remain in office, the orders [485] of the Gestapo; he was strengthened in this view by the fact that his remaining in office was desired both on the Jewish side and by respectable figures in the non-Jewish part of the Kreis population, and even explicitly asked for; if in this weighing up he had based himself on inaccurate expectations or if the weighing up as such was incorrect, this was at most a political error, not a criminal fault.

That accused S., and with him the circles supporting him in his resolution, were making a severe political mistake in this consideration, even if the premises of the weighing up be supposed to be correct, is plain. During the rule of National Socialism, the temptation was — it may be admitted — indeed great to come to terms with the unbearable, whether out of fear of worse yet to come or in the hope of being able to maintain for oneself and others a 'party-free' reservation — however small. This fear and this hope, both of these elements in the thinking of accused S., were very well recognized by National Socialism, which used them and abused them as a psychological and political factor. Inside the official apparatus, in general only the key positions were occupied by ideologically committed and reliable party comrades. That was quite enough. The rest of the officials could be left with the illusion of freedom in little things, indeed even a certain actual freedom; that was a cheap price to pay for their compliance in all important matters, and they were willing to pay it for they knew very well that all those who — like accused S. — pursued opportunist policies in order to maintain their freedom of action ultimately became prisoners of their own policies.

Thus it could not fail to happen, and, as this case showed actually did happen, that part of the civil service bowed to immoral and illegal impositions; what began as a political error ended as moral and criminal guilt. When politics comes into conflict with law and morality, this conflict can be solved only in the sense that law and morality must never be adjusted to politics, but politics must always be to law and morality. This principle applies to the State as a whole; it applies to every official as an individual. Each citizen has a right to have an official, from whom an immoral and illegal action is demanded, refrain from that action; each citizen must be protected against officials, irrespective of the considerations they base themselves on, committing such acts. An official who fails to see this is acting not simply unwisely politically because he is undermining trust in the lawfulness of the administration, but at the same time unlawfully. That is why accused S. must be refused the appeal to the balancing of interests he did; an error as to the admissibility of this balancing of interests counts against him.

It should further be added that it is only times of such general spiritual wrong as we have just lived through, and of exaggerated legal positivism and utilitarianism, that could have enabled such a balancing of interests to be considered admissible. According to Christian teaching, it is presumption to risk the certain sacrifice of one moral good against the uncertain gaining or preservation of another moral good and thus replace divine providence with one's own providence. Every moral precept is binding unconditionally and regardless: 'No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the Kingdom of God' (Luke 9: 62).

(b) The question still has to be tested whether accused S. in carrying out the Gestapo orders was in a genuine or at least presumptive [vermeintlicher] state of necessity [Notstand], whether he was determined in his decisions by this necessity and whether if this were to be the case his punishability would be ruled out on that plea. [486]

Control Council Law No. 10, Article II(4)(b), contains the following provision: 'Le fait, qu'une personne ait agi conformément aux ordres de son gouvernement ou d'un supérieur, ne la dégage pas de la responsabilité d'un crime, mais peut être considéré comme une cause de circonstances atténuantes.' ['The fact that any person acted pursuant to the order of his Government or of a superior does not free him from responsibility for a crime, but may be considered in mitigation.']

The Nuremberg Judgment of 30 September/1 October 1946 states the following on Article 8 of the Statute, which corresponds in content to the provision of Control Council Law No. 10 just stated: 'Les dispositions de cet article sont conformes au droit commun des Etats. L'ordre reçu par un soldat de tuer ou de torturer, en violation du Droit international de la guerre, n'a jamais été regardé comme justifiant ces actes de violence. Il ne peut s'en prévaloir, aux termes du Statut, que pour obtenir une réduction de la peine. Le vrai critérium de la responsabilité pénale, celui qu'on trouve, sous une forme ou sous une autre, dans le droit criminel de la plupart des pays, n'est nullement en rapport avec l'ordre reçu. Il réside dans la liberté morale, dans la faculté de choisir, chez l'auteur de l'acte reproché.' ['The provisions of this Article are in conformity with the law of all nations. That a soldier was ordered to kill or torture in violation of the international law of war has never been recognised as a defence to such acts of brutality, though, as the Charter here provides, the order may be urged in mitigation of the punishment. The true test, which is found in varying degrees in the criminal law of most nations, is not the existence of the order, but whether moral choice was in fact possible.']

5203

5910

This establishes on the one hand that acting on orders cannot be recognized as a ground excluding guilt or punishment, and why this is so, but on the other clarifies that a so-called state of necessity, in which the person acting lacks liberté morale, the faculté de choisir, is in some circumstances to be taken into account, and that it may be important whether — as the English text of the Nuremberg Judgment puts it — 'moral choice was in fact possible'.

The Court assumes that accused S., had he refused to carry out the order from the Gestapo, would have been removed from office and punished, and that the possibility cannot be rejected out of hand that such a refusal might have brought with it other severe drawbacks (such as consignment to a concentration camp) for him. This is equally true for all four deportations.

But this fact does not rule out guilt and punishability of accused S., for several reasons.

(aa) First, the accused was not determined in his carrying out the Gestapo orders by the situation he found himself in, i.e. by fear or cowardice, but exclusively by the balancing of interests he carried out, which has already been assessed. The accused explicitly and unambiguously stated this at the trial, and this statement is credible. It shows that the accused, on the basis of the balancing of interests he undertook, would have carried out the Gestapo orders even had he not found himself in the position mentioned. Under these circumstances, the accused cannot benefit from a plea of necessity excluding punishment or guilt, irrespective of any influence it may have on the calculation of penalty. Where somebody, despite a state of necessity, resolves on criminal action irrespective of the reasons, it cannot then be said that he could rely on the consideration that justifies the plea of necessity as a ground of exclusion of punishment or guilt, namely that the person did not have liberté morale, the faculté de choisir. On the contrary, the decision taken by him proves precisely that he did have freedom to decide, that 'moral choice was in fact possible' for him, and that he also made use of this freedom of choice.

(bb) Second, consideration should be given to the fact that not every state of necessity can excuse every crime. It is acknowledged and also justified that the plea of necessity fails in cases where official and professional duties establish the legal obligation to resist the state of necessity. But this was the very situation the accused S. was in: what was being expected of him was a gross infringement of his official duty, not merely an infringement of a general duty of citizens; despite the state of necessity that existed, he had to refuse this expectation. The attempt to take a lax view here can be countered by the apposite statement of a Swabian [487] publicist of the 18th century (Moser, Von der deutschen Reichsstände Landen, Frankfurt, 1769, p. 1157):[3] 'What, though, if a sovereign orders some collective body, councillor, official, officer or whomever something that is known to be against the country's Constitution? Whoever fears God more than man, or merely only is a truly honourable man in other respects, will modestly decline and not do it, preferring to suffer over what he cannot change. But because few think thus, things happen as they do; but things will also so happen on the great Day of Judgment to those who ordered it, and to those who complied.'

3 J.J. Moser, Von der Teutschen Reichs-Stände Landen, deren Landständen, Unterthanen, Landes-Freyheiten, Beschwerden, Schulden und Zusammenkünfften (Frankfurt, 1769).

What was said then in the age of feudal absolutism must apply a fortiori to the age of democracy.

A distinction between judges and administrative officials, say on the basis of the consideration that the judge is 'independent and subject only to the laws' while the administrative official is dependent and bound by instructions from his superior, cannot be drawn here. The citizen has just as much of a claim to lawful administration as to lawful adjudication, and if the judge 'is subject only to the law', the administrative official is also bound only by legal instructions.

Finally, it should be borne in mind that under the rule of National Socialism almost every official ordered to carry out an illegal or immoral order was in a situation of necessity in the event of disobedience. If the Head of the Stuttgart Head Office of the Gestapo, who after all was also acting only on higher instruction in the deportation of the Jews, had refused to act then he would have been exposed to at least the same reprisals as the accused S. had to fear. Were all higher officials who collaborated in the deportation of the Jews to be allowed the plea of necessity then probably no one could be punished for their participation; the provision of Control Council Law No. 10 that acting on orders does not remove criminal responsibility would then be rendered invalid in practice in an indirect way.

(cc) Third, it is acknowledged that the plea of necessity fails where the situation of necessity is caused by one's own fault, in particular, where the perpetrator could foresee he might come into a situation of necessity, and had not exploited a possibility of avoiding this situation. The accused S., however, arrived at this position, where in refusing to execute the Gestapo's orders he could have expected severe detriment, through his own fault. From the whole development of policy against the Jews as presented above, the accused had to draw the conclusion that he as a Landrat would also be likely to have to carry out further immoral measures against the Jews if he remained in office. In particular, the deportation of Jews from Baden to France, by then generally known, was to be regarded as a harbinger of further persecutions of the Jews. But a leading political official like the accused, as a Landrat, must be expected, given such a development, to draw the consequences early and render his post vacant. He could have had himself moved inconspicuously to a politically neutral post. It is still clearer with the second, third and fourth transport that the position that the Gestapo orders brought him into was entirely his own fault. On the one hand, it was foreseeable that the first deportation would be followed by still others, since the order of 18 November 1941 stated that Kreis Hechingen would be involved in the announced 'purge of all Europe from Jews'.

3284

initially only with the number of the Jews communicated therein, and thereby hinting at further deportations; further, one had to expect the possibility, nay likelihood, that in these further deportations the Landrat would have to participate in more or less the same way as in the first one. [488] On the other hand, the accused S. would in the period between the first and second deportations, a period of some 4 months, have had the possibility of resigning his post, which would probably have had detrimental effects on his wealth or earnings, but at any rate not have resulted in a situation of necessity.

[. . .] Sentencing of S. [. . .]

IV. The Accused Ho., K. and B.

(1) The accused Ho., K. and B., as already stated in the first section of the grounds of judgment, undertook the body-searching of the Jewish women for deportation ordered by the Gestapo immediately before their departure; all three of them undertook this body-search together with the absconding Mrs M. of Heigerloch on 27 November 1941; additionally the accused Ho. made this body-search together with Mrs M., again on 19 August 1942.

These findings are to be supplemented by the following findings based on the trial and taking of evidence.

(a) The accused Ho. received her instructions from the accused S., to whom she was officially subordinate as a welfare nurse, and was informed initially by him and then further by Mayor R. of Haigerloch as to the content of this task. She carried out the task on 27 November 1941 by having some of the Jewish women — the rest of them being processed partly by the accused K., partly by accused B., partly by Mrs M. — hand over their jewellery; the Jewish women had then to open their clothing so as to expose places where there might be necklaces or brooches. She also body-searched some of the Jewish women. That the accused Ho. used violence has not been shown; the use of force was in the given situation not necessary, since the Jewish women were left with no choice but to succumb to their fate and hand over their jewellery to the accused, whether after special demand for it or without such demand. The jewellery the accused Ho. took in this fashion was then handed over to Mayor R. These findings are based on the statements by the accused herself; they are confirmed by the statement of witness Ms W., who had like her sister Mrs L. been searched by the accused Ho., and of witness Ka., who was among the deportees at the time, along with his wife.

The accused Ho. acted similarly in the search on 19 August 1942, at which, as already mentioned, she was associated with M. in carrying out the tasks. This finding is based on the accused's own statements.

(b) The accused K. similarly received her instructions from the accused S., to whom she too as a welfare nurse was subordinate, though not directly but through mediation of the accused Ho., who initially told her only that she had to be at the station in Haigerloch on 27 November 1941 for the transporting of the Jews. Further instructions were received by the accused K. only at the station in Haigerloch, shortly before the search began. The accused carried out her task in the same way as co-defendant Ho., by having the Jewish women hand over their jewellery; that she also body-searched those Jewish women was credibly denied by her. These findings are based on the accused's own statements.

(c) The accused B. received her instructions from Mayor R. of Haigerloch, who approached her on 27 November 1941 and ordered her to go to the station in Haigerloch. The accused, who was not in public service and accordingly would have been entitled to refuse to act, while initially resisting compliance with Mayor R.'s orders finally did comply, after Mayor R. had searched her out repeatedly and [489] insisted on his order being carried out. The accused reached the station in Haigerloch only after the search of the Jewish women had already begun, and was there instructed on what she had to do. She then participated in the search in the same way as co-defendant Ho., by having the Jewish women hand over their jewellery; she too has convincingly denied having body-searched the Jewish women. These findings are based on the accused's own statements. When before the fourth deportation the accused again received the order from Mayor R. to participate in searching the Jewish women, she successfully refused to comply with the order.

(2) The accused Ho., K. and B., by undertaking the search of the Jewish women for deportation, objectively took part, specifically as accessories (Gehilfen), in a persecution on racial grounds and thus in a crime against humanity within the meaning of Article II(1)(c), (2)(b) and (3) of Control Council Law No. 10. Their involvement was admittedly, considered in the context of the whole, only of a subordinate nature, and the three accused did not, by contrast with co-defendant S., infringe any special set of duties. What nonetheless makes their involvement punishable is the fact that the body search taken together with the removal of the valuables found thereby was particularly degrading for the Jewish women affected.

In subjective respects, the punishability of the three accused depends on whether they deliberately (vorsätzlich) acted as accessories (Gehilfen). This condition is met for all three of these accused.

The accused recognized (accused K. and B. at the latest by the time they were at the station in Haigerloch and accused Ho. earlier, when she received the order given to her) that they were being called on to take part in a persecution on racial grounds; this finding is hereby made on the basis of the oral proceedings. That these three accused did not know the contents of the Gestapo decrees and could not therefore fully perceive what measures of persecution the Jews would individually be exposed to is irrelevant; what they did know, namely that Jews were being forcibly deported and in this connection searched and made to hand over jewellery, suffices to establish intention in their cases. This knowledge (Wissen) was also inevitably associated with the insight that through their actions the accused were furthering the principal offence.

Intentionality as accessory (Gehilfenvorsatz) did not require that the accused acted from racial motives and further did not require that they had an awareness of the illegality (Bewusstsein der Rechtswidrigkeit) of their actions, as has already been explained in the judgment on accused S. It is similarly irrelevant that if an individual accused or all the accused had refused their participation, the search would still have been carried out by the remaining accused, or by other persons.

Nor can these three accused appeal to lawful excuses from guilt or from punishment. Though they acted on orders, with accused B., moreover, acting on an order with no formal basis, this does not make them exempt from punishment. None of the three accused were in a genuine or even only presumptive state of necessity and none of the three accused has pleaded such necessity. None of the three accused, as is hereby found on the basis of the trial, were governed by fear that their refusal would or could bring danger to life or limb for them.

The accused Ho. has stated as a motive for her decision to take part in the search that co-defendant S. had given the order to her and to accused K. because he desired and expected that she and accused K. would proceed with particular lenience, and because he expected that the search, if not undertaken by a person determined by Mayor R., [490] would be carried out intolerantly, if not indeed vexatiously. This is credible and has been confirmed by co-defendant S., and it is further credible that accused Ho. agreed with accused K. before the start of the search that they would carry it out only formally, and not take anything away from the Jewish women. But both accused Ho. and accused K. abandoned this intention again when they noted that co-defendants B. and Mrs M. were also taking part in the search, and they did not feel they could believe they would not take anything away from the Jewish women. The initial motive that decided accused Ho. and possibly also accused K. in taking on the order was replaced before carrying it out by a different and definitive motive which was in turn also decisive for the nature of its execution. [. . .]

(c) [. . .] Determination of penalty in relation to Ho.

The fact that accused Ho., by contrast with the prosecution assumption, took part not in four but only in two searches needed no explicit emphasis in the judgment; it suffices, on the model of the Nuremberg Judgment of 30 September/1 October 1946, for this finding to be contained in the grounds of judgment, as it is.

(bb) [. . .] Determination of penalty in relation to K.

The fact that accused K., by contrast with the prosecution assumption, took part not in four but only in two searches needed no explicit emphasis in the judgment; it suffices, on the model of the Nuremberg Judgment of 30 September/1 October 1946, for this finding to be contained in the grounds of judgment, as it is.

(cc) [. . .] Determination of penalty in relation to B.
[. . .]

V. The Accused H.

(1) Accused H. in his capacity as official doctor of Kreis Hechingen and following an order given him by the Landrat of Kreis Hechingen on the occasion of the first, second and third deportations of the Jews gave expert reports on whether particular Jews to be deported were capable of being transported or of travelling; in the third deportation, he also partly extended his report to whether the Jews concerned required continuous care and attention and whether they were capable of work. The prosecution challenged this testimony in the following seven cases: [491] [. . .]

The Gestapo ordered the Jews named to be transported, with the exception of Julius Baer, who was deferred from the third transport and affected only by the fourth deportation.

The facts have been found as the outcome of the trial, on the basis of the accused's own statements together with the testimony read out at the trial: in the cases listed under (a) through (c) above, the attending physicians confirmed as witnesses that they had pronounced as stated.

(2) That accused H. in his capacity as official physician pronounced as to the state of health of the Jews to be deported although he knew that this was a deportation and accordingly persecution on race grounds does not make him punishable, because in giving the expert opinions, as long as these were objectively true, he did not infringe his duties. The Prosecution has accordingly rightly confined itself to those cases in which it felt it could assume infringement of those duties by accused H.

Accused H. would certainly have committed a breach of duty had he given knowingly false reports, in particular had he, with the intention of furthering the deportations, applied excessively strict criteria. This did not occur. According to the report by the expert Dr He., the official medical certificates made out by the accused were an objectively accurate answer to the questions submitted to him. To be sure, the questions to the accused were wrong to the extent that it was not merely the fitness of the Jews in question to be transported but additionally for deportation that was involved, i.e. whether it were not necessary to exclude these Jews from the deportation in the light of their illness or frailty, from considerations of a similar nature as had initially excluded Jews over 65. But that the question put to him was wrong was something the accused did not know, since he did not know the wording of the Gestapo decrees and was at any rate not acting intentionally (vorsätzlich) when he omitted to procure knowledge of the wording of those decrees.

The accused H. would have committed a breach of duty also if, in the cases in which he affirmed transportability only conditionally and with certain criteria, he had been aware that the conditions stated by him were not in fact present; in that case by stating these conditions he would have merely been seeking to maintain the outward appearance of an objective assessment. It would have been obvious for the accused to ascertain whether these conditions [492] could be met, but it cannot be shown against the accused that he omitted this enquiry with the intention of thereby furthering the deportation (der Deportation Vorschub leisten).

The accused H. has accordingly been acquitted, and the costs incurred from the criminal prosecution against him are to be met from public funds (§467 StG B), whereas the other costs of the proceedings are to borne by the four accused convicted (§465 StPO) [493] [. . .].

Dr. H. was acquitted, whereas Landrat S. and the three female defendants (Ho., K. and B.) were convicted of crimes against humanity; S. and defendants Ho. and K. appealed.

Court of Appeal (Oberlandesgericht) Tübingen, Judgment of 20 January 1948, ss 54/47[4]

[. . .]

V. The Appeal of Accused S. on the Merits

The verdict challenged deals in its first part, the general findings of fact, with the Gestapo order of 18 November 1941 on the 'deportation of the Jews to the General-Kommissariat Ostland'. The Decree ordering the first deportation lists what the Jews to be deported could take with them. The judgment says the following on this: 'These orders were explained in a letter of 19 November 1941 which the Jewish religious community of Württemberg, had sent, with the authorization and on the orders of the Gestapo, [496] to the individual participants in the transport.' As the trial record shows, on the basis of a court decision this letter had been read out in full verbatim at the hearing by the Criminal Division on 23 June 1947. This reading made it an object of the trial and it has therefore to be taken into account.

This circular letter informed those concerned that they had been assigned to an evacuation transport to the East, and obliged them to be ready at their current accommodation and not to leave this without special permission from the Authorities, even temporarily. Employment, even in important enterprises, did not exempt them from the evacuation. It explicitly warned the Jews not to oppose or avoid the evacuation. Any attempt in this direction was pointless and could lead to severe consequences for those concerned. A list was also given of what could be taken with them. Mention was made here of the particular importance of construction tools. The attached declaration of assets was to be filled in precisely. With delivery of the letter, as was stated therein, a general prohibition to dispose of their assets was placed on the recipients by explicit instruction of the authorities. The letter explained the instructions in this restraining order in more detail.

The finding of the judgment in the sentence cited earlier accordingly conveyed the content of the circular by no means exhaustively, but only inexactly and imperfectly. No further mention is made of it in the rest of the grounds of judgment. In their letter, the heads of the Jewish religious community termed the carrying out of the measures indispensable and called all resistance against it meaningless, and stated that it was an evacuation to the East. The content of this letter could have been of significance for the position of accused S. on the Gestapo order and his own decision. The Court had accordingly to test whether the accused was influenced in his decision by knowledge of this letter, and what importance he attributed to it. No finding or assessment to this effect is contained in the judgment.

4 Cassese, supra note 1, 494–502.

This bench holds to the consistent case law of the Reichsgericht that an unclear or incomprehensible and therefore insufficient statement of the facts constitutes a contravention of material law. Such a contravention may also be present 'where a criminal court's judgment, while finding facts that may be capable of influencing the assessment of the facts in the accused's favour or otherwise, has not discussed them in the concluding assessment' (Löwe-Rosenberg, StPO 2. Nachtrag 1940 zu § 337 A. 159, with references to the judgments given).

There is such a contravention here. On the basis of the general objection of infringement of material law, accordingly, the judgment against the accused S. is by § 353(1) StPO to be set aside. Also to be set aside, by § 353(2) are the findings underlying the judgment where affected by this flaw. On the basis of § 353(4) StPO the matter is to be referred back for further hearing and decision.

VI. The Appeal by the Accused Ho. and K.

The quashing of the judgment against accused S. does not affect the verdicts on accused Ho. and K. For them, the error noted above is irrelevant, since as is evident from the judgment of the Criminal Division they had no knowledge of the letter from the religious community.

The Criminal Division tested the actions of all the accused from the viewpoint of a crime against humanity within the meaning of Article II(1)(c) of Control Council Law No. 10 and found that this Law is valid law for Germany [497] and is binding on German courts. There is no contravention of law here. The Württemberg-Hohenzollern military government has pronounced the German courts competent to judge in the instant case (Article III(1)(2) of the Law).

The Criminal Division goes on to correctly state that the ban on retroactivity does not stand in the way of applying the Law. For the actions made punishable by the act offended against the generally recognized legal and moral principles of all civilized peoples even at the time they were committed and thus constitute a wrong (Unrecht), a crime (Verbrechen). It is therefore consonant with justice that such severe misdeeds be punished. Thus, legal certainty is also satisfied, and that is what the ban on retroactivity is intended to serve. Were such deeds to remain unpunished, then legal certainty and justice would be undermined.

Crimes against humanity are inhuman and cruel actions directed against elementary human rights, against human beings in their dignity and value. They arise from a political ideology that despises these human rights; they are committed out of an inhumane mindset (cf. also LG Konstanz DRZ 1947 at 267.

5914

OLG Cologne NJW 1947, at 70, KG DRZ 1947 at 308; cf. also the judgment of the Supreme Court of Justice in Rastatt of 1.2.1947, JO 1947 at 662).

Persecution on political, racial and religious grounds is listed in Article II(1)(c) of the Law as the last explanatory example of a crime against humanity. This crime too must accordingly be carried out inhumanely. The perpetrator must have acted out of an inhumane mindset, derived from a politically, racially or religiously determined ideology (cf. also LG Konstanz MDR 1947 at 305, OLG Kiel MDR 1947 at 307; cf. also KG DRZ 1947 at 309).

[Control Council] Law No. 10, in Article II(2)(a)-(e), equates all conceivable forms of commission or participation. It does not distinguish between perpetration (Täterschaft) and participation (Teilnahme). The accessory (Gehilfe) to a crime against humanity is 'regarded as guilty of a crime against humanity, without regard to the capacity in which he acted' (Clause 2 of the Introductory Act). From this complete equation with the perpetrator it follows that the accessory must have acted from the same mindset as the perpetrator himself, that is, from an inhumane mindset and in persecutions under politically, racially or religiously determined ideologies. The Criminal Division rightly took it that as regards the punishability of participation, Law No. 10 is of plain interpretation.

For intention (Vorsatz), awareness of illegality (Bewusstsein der Rechtswidrigkeit) is a requisite (cf. also KG DRX 1947 at 310, OLG Frankfurt/M. SJZ 1947 at 626). The accused had to have the awareness of having infringed a law or otherwise doing wrong. If they did not have this awareness, they cannot plead that ignorance if it is based on an attitude that is in contradiction to the generally recognized moral law (cf. also OLG Frankfurt/M. SJZ 1947, at 626, KG DRZ 1947, at 198). Nor can the accused appeal to the National Socialist legislation against Jews as an excuse. For it is in contradiction with the general legal consciousness and moral law, and was a wrong only camouflaged, not justified, by legalization.

The deportation of Jews in 1941 and 1942 had as its object the systematic extermination of the deportees, was conceived from hatred of the Jews and cruelly executed, and marked by the anti-Semitism, the extent and the nature of the extirpation qualified unmistakably as a crime against humanity. The men who suggested, ordered or otherwise performed as their work these deportations are guilty as principal offenders (hauptsächliche Verbrecher) of the persecution of the Jews. They had the decisive power, particularly in the offices of the Gestapo. They would also be punishable for grave deprivation of liberty while in office, extortion and murder to the extent [498] that German law were to be applied. In order to carry out these crimes, legalized in form, a comprehensive, highly structured organization was partly built up and partly brought in, the organization of the State authorities also being abused for the purpose. An uncountable number of assistants (Hilfskräften) acted in it. Their conduct is to be assessed according to their position, their insight into the criminal objectives and the extent of their collaboration.

The holders of higher official posts and offices, among them those of Landrat, were able in view of their office, their general and specialized education, their knowledge of law and political life and their other experience of life to recognize and evaluate the factual and legal position. That they did not have an awareness of the illegality can be recognized only in individual cases on proof of special circumstances. Ordinary people (Einfache Menschen) by contrast, who were involved only on the margins of the events and carried out only subordinate activities, who very frequently had a limited field of view so that they could not perceive the connections, will, according to general experience of life, have acted culpably only in special cases.

The accused Ho. and K. were, according to the Criminal Division's findings, involved only in a subordinate manner in the deportations. In doing so they behaved particularly leniently and sympathetically, i.e. humanely. Their attitudes were not anti-Jewish. Moreover, as the judgment also explicitly finds, they did not have an awareness of the illegality (Bewusstsein der Rechtswidrigkeit) of what they were doing. They are accordingly not guilty, whether under Law No. 10 or in German criminal law. By § 353(1) StPO the [Tribunal's] judgment is to be set aside. Both these accused are to be acquitted.

VII. The Verdict on Accused B.

Co-defendant B. lodged no appeal. The judgment found that accused B. was involved in the same manner as accused Ho. in searching the Jewish women to be transported, that her involvement was, like that of the accused Ho. and K., of a subordinate nature and that it had not been shown that she acted out of National Socialist ideology or from racial motives. She too lacked awareness of the illegality. The conviction of accused B. is accordingly based on the same contravention of law as the conviction of the accused Ho. and K. For this reason, accused B. is according to § 357 StPO to be treated in the same way as if she had lodged an appeal. Her conviction is accordingly to be set aside and accused B. is to be acquitted.

VIII. Viewpoints for the new trial and decision in the case of accused S.

(1) The accused cannot appeal to the Gestapo decrees as binding orders from his superior authorities, to justify or excuse his actions. This is explicitly provided by Article II(4)(b) of Law No. 10 and has not been misjudged by the judgment challenged.

(2) Even in so far as these decrees had the outward appearance of legal orders they were illegal, since their content constituted a gross wrong (IV above).

(3) On the state of necessity over and above the law (übergesetzlicher Notstand) The judgment challenged finds that the accused was an inward opponent of National Socialism (innerlich ein Gegner des Nationalsozialismus), had also confirmed this attitude in his conduct in office and was not an anti-Semite. That meant, however, that there existed a possibility that he was brought by the Gestapo orders into great internal anxiety that compelled him to weigh up the conflicting duties and choose between them. In dealing with the balance of duties and interests asserted by the accused the judgment challenged states: 'It should further be added that [499] it is only times of such general spiritual wrong as we have just lived through, and of exaggerated legal positivism and utilitarianism, that could have enabled such a balancing of interests to be considered admissible.' It cannot clearly be seen whether an inadmissible balance between moral duties and allegedly political considerations is being criticized, or the appeal to the state of necessity over and above the law is being termed inadmissible as such. If the former was the intention, there was a failure to see that even in political considerations moral principles must find application. Were the accused to be charged with taking an immoral stance in a political decision, this would have to be unambiguously established. If however the state of necessity over and above the law itself was meant, then the Court fell into an error. For the viewpoint favourable to the balancing of legal goods and duties has asserted itself precisely against an exaggerated legal positivism. It is taken from the unwritten law above the law that forms the basis of any legal system. Nor does a mere utility viewpoint find expression in it. Where duties conflict and different legal goods are in conflict with each other, then the conflict has to be resolved, the balancing carried out, according to the basic idea of the legal system and the value relationships expressed in it. Especially in extraordinary circumstances of life under abnormal circumstances of government and law, when traditional standards fail, the question whether an action was criminal or was aimed at protecting particular legal goods must be tested in detail and the contradiction between duties and legal goods carefully weighed up.

3288

The legal idea of the state of necessity over and above the law was already brought forth in case law of the Reichsgericht in a judgment of 11 March 1927 — RGSt. 62 p. 242 ff. — and has since then been applied continually. There is no reason here to depart from this generally recognized case law. The Criminal Division will accordingly have to test whether the accused acted in such a state of necessity over and above the law.

The question of the moral admissibility of the action is not affected by this principle. This was already stated by the Reichsgericht in the above-mentioned judgment. To this extent too the Criminal Division has made a legally inadmissible evaluation. It states, following on from the above-cited sentence, that according to Christian teaching it is presumption to risk the certain sacrifice of one moral good against the uncertain gaining or preservation of another moral good. Every moral precept is binding unconditionally and regardless. It need not be gone into whether the content of Christian moral doctrine is correctly given here. For the accused's act was to be evaluated not from the viewpoint of morality, still less a rigorist moral doctrine, but by the criterion of law. Law and morality intersect, but do not overlap.

The Criminal Division will, in testing the question whether the accused was in a state of necessity as regards his duties, out of which there was in fact or in his opinion no other way than to carry out the Gestapo decrees, in particular also have to take account of the circular (Rundschreiben) emanating from the Jewish religious community.

(4) On the state of necessity (Notstand) as a ground for exclusion of guilt

If the accused acted without a justifying ground, the Criminal Division will have to go on to test whether the accused's guilt was excluded by a state of necessity.

The judgment challenged, following the judgment of the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal of 30/9-1/10/1946 (JO 1946 p. 378), did not fail to see that such a state of necessity is in some circumstances to be taken into account. It also sees that the accused, had he refused obedience, would have been removed from office and punished, and the possibility cannot be ignored that such refusal would have had still other severe detriment as a consequence (such as the concentration camp). [500] This applies in the same way to all the four deportations the accused took part in.

The Criminal Division's further analyses are however not without legal error. The judgment finds that accused S. did not plead necessity and accordingly refrains from a test from this point of view. The Court ought however, if there is occasion, to do the test ex officio, and decide whether a state of necessity was present for the accused or whether he erroneously saw a state of necessity as present. If the accused did not plead necessity, the Criminal Division was entitled to take it that the accused himself did not believe that there was a state of necessity for him, even were it otherwise. That did not however mean finding that in fact no state of necessity existed for the accused.

It is further stated in the judgment that the accused allowed himself to be guided exclusively by a balancing of interests; it would then be impossible that for him to have been determined by a state of necessity in his decision. This view conflicts with one's experience of life. A balancing of duties and compulsion are not mutually exclusive, but can act on the person deciding as motives alongside each other or successively and compel him to a particular action.

The Criminal Division stresses that the state of necessity was the fault of the accused. It is first to be tested whether there was a state of compulsion (Nötigungsstand) within the meaning of § 52 StGB, that is, whether the accused was constrained to the act under accusation by a third party through irresistible force or through a threat associated with a present and not otherwise resistible danger to his own life and limb or that of a relative. Such action exerted by a third party through coercion can remove the freedom of the will and compel one under someone else's will. The person deciding cannot, irrespective of how he came to be in this position, be accused of culpable action, because of the constraint exercised upon his will. For the area of application of § 52 StGB, accordingly, the question whether the accused culpably arrived in a position of compulsion of this nature is excluded. Whether the threat postulated by § 52 StGB was contained in the Gestapo orders for the event of refusal to obey or whether in general such a position of terror existed for the accused is to be tested. The Criminal Division's considerations as to whether the accused had culpably come into a position of necessity could have been formulated only within the framework of § 54 StGB.

The Criminal Division says that the accused was by his office and occupation legally obliged to resist the state of necessity. If however his free will was excluded within the meaning of § 52 StGB through constraint by someone else then there is no room for such a consideration.

5916

The question would however also have to be answered negatively for the case of § 54 StGB in relation to the accused. The law recognizes for the state of necessity in general the mental pressure that may bear down on someone taking a decision and takes account here of the human urge for self-preservation and thus also of general human weakness. These principles cease to apply only where there is a special legal duty to sacrifice life and limb. Such a duty is set for, say, police officials and firemen by the nature of their professional tasks. But the judgment challenged assumes such a professional duty for the accused too, but wrongly. Setting his own life and limb and that of his relatives at risk in performing his administrative duties was not necessarily legally required of the accused in his exercise of the office of Landrat. Special circumstances that might allow some other legal evaluation to be admissible were not found by the Criminal Division.

Where the judgment challenged refuses the accused the plea of necessity then here too it has confused law and morality and placed too high requirements on the accused's conduct. It is certainly morally necessary for resistance to be offered to wrong and criminality without regard to harm to life and soul. [501] Yet in law one has to do not with what one may expect from a hero or a saint, but with what can and must be demanded of the average morally inclined legal subject. [. . .] [502]

Thus the Court of appeal acquitted Ho. and K., cancelled the conviction of B., and remitted the case concerning Landrat S. to a lower court, instructing it to rely upon the notion of necessity, as defined by the Court of appeal.

3290

C

Louisiana Law Review
Fall 1998

*325 THE MENTAL ELEMENT REQUIRED FOR ACCOMPLICE LIABILITY: A TOPIC NOTE

Candace Courteau

Copyright (c) 1998 Louisiana Law Review; Candace Courteau

I. Introduction

To be guilty of a crime the offender must meet the act requirement (actus reus) and have the specific state of mind (mens rea) necessary to commit the offense. [FN1] In the realm of accomplice liability, one is liable as an accomplice to the crime of another if he gave assistance with the required mental state. [FN2] Yet, for an accomplice the act requirement is much less stringent, as the primary actor's act is imputed to the accomplice as long as the accomplice gave some assistance. [FN3] Moreover, there has been considerable debate about the level of intent required for accomplice liability. [FN4]

This article will focus on the second element of accomplice liability-the mental element. [FN5] Its purpose is to give a general analytical survey of the law of accomplice liability regarding the requisite mental element. Usually the courts' substantive analysis as to these decisions is confusing. Nevertheless, since the actions of the primary actor are imputed to the accomplice and the degree of assistance of the accomplice minimal, a clear rule about the sufficiency of the mental element of the accomplice is needed to limit the theory within justifiable bounds. [FN6]

First, this article will explore the origins and competing policies behind accomplice liability. Second, it will review what theories other jurisdictions and *326 the Model Penal Code have imposed on accomplice liability. Third, it will address the theories that Louisiana has employed in fashioning accomplice liability. Fourth, the theory of accomplice liability with regard to recklessness/negligence crimes will be discussed. In conclusion, the author will review suggestions for clarifying the law.

II. Origins and Policies of Accomplice Liability

Under the common-law, parties to crime were divided into different degrees. [FN7] An aider and abettor who was actually or constructively present at the crime was classified as a principal in the second degree. [FN8] This party either had to act with the intent required for the underlying crime or with guilty knowledge. [FN9] Thus, at common law, an accomplice that assisted the perpetrator with knowledge of the perpetrator's criminal purpose could be held liable for the substantive offense.

The two major policies which underlie accomplice liability are deterrence and personal culpability. [FN10] Reasons given for holding an accomplice liable are 1) to punish him for his actions and 2) to prevent/deter him from committing this type of crime again. [FN11] Since the aider and abettor lends his assistance to the perpetrator, his actions help to bring about the prohibited result. Society recognizes that this dangerous aider and abettor's conduct should be deterred and that he or she should be punished. [FN12] Some suggest the deterrence policy applies better to accomplices than to perpetrators because "[w]hen the crime is . . . committed by a third person, the usual strain and immediacy involved in the decision-making is not present." [FN13] Therefore, the "accomplice . . . [can] calculate deliberately the consequences of his actions." [FN14]

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

However, critics of the deterrence policy argue that "[n]ot all accomplices should be treated alike." [FN15] Not all accomplices present as much danger as the *327 perpetrator. [FN16] Since "accomplices [vary] in their type of involvement in group crime, a model based on specific deterrence or rehabilitation is unlikely to be generally effective." [FN17]

The interest of society in deterring criminals must be balanced against the "interest of the individual in being free unless found legally blameworthy." [FN18] In criminal law, a "deeply rooted" principle exists that one should be liable only for one's personal guilt. [FN19] Accomplice liability "skirts the boundaries" of this principle. [FN20] Thus, theorists have endeavored to reconcile accomplice liability and personal liability. [FN21] Two rationales for holding the accomplice liable even though he did not commit the act are: (1) the rules of agency, and (2) the forfeited personal identity doctrine. [FN22]

Under civil agency theory, the principal "agrees" to be bound by the acts of the agent and to be personally liable for those acts. [FN23] Similarly, "the accomplice authorizes the primary actor's conduct . . . [and] accepts it as her own." [FN24] However, civil agency "requires a party to consent to being subjected to the control of another, whereas criminal liability does not." [FN25] In criminal law there is no requirement of consent between the principal and the accomplice. The lack of consent in criminal agency theory ignores the fundamental premise upon which civil agency is based, and for this reason, the analogy has its limits.

The second theory underlying accomplice liability, the forfeited personal identity doctrine, provides that a person who chooses to aid in a crime forfeits his or her personal identity and that his or her identity becomes bound up in that of the principal. [FN26] Under this theory, "[w]e pretend the accomplice is no more than an incorporeal shadow" of the main perpetrator. [FN27] However, critics have argued that by molding one person's identity into another's as justification for accomplice liability, this doctrine "permits society to ignore the potentially numerous levels of personal culpability and personal involvement of wrongdoers," [FN28] thus punishing one for harm that he may not have intended or caused. *328 Moreover, accomplice liability may not be linked to causation. [FN29] Even though the accomplice may not have caused the harm, he can be treated as severely as the perpetrator who did. [FN30]

These theories may help explain the rationale behind accomplice liability to some extent; however, there are moral problems with treating the accomplice as a "mere incorporeal shadow." [FN31] It would be better to recognize that "moral intuition" tells society that those who "[willfully participate] in crime should be punished." [FN32] Then, instead of molding the accomplice's identity into that of the perpetrator, the accomplice's own personal culpability could be examined to determine the degree of punishment he deserves.

III. Knowledge v. Intent-The Search for the Proper Standard

There has been a long, ongoing debate about the requisite mental standard for an accomplice. An accomplice must really have two mental states: 1) to assist the principal, and 2) to commit the substantive offense. [FN33] The difficulty lies in determining the standard for the mental element that the accomplice must have with respect to the core offense. Historically at common law, knowledge of the perpetrator's criminal intent was sufficient to hold the accomplice liable for the underlying crime. [FN34] Today, many argue that the accomplice must himself have the intent required for the substantive crime so as not to subvert the principle of criminal law that one should be punished only to the extent of one's personal culpability. [FN35] Thus, standards range from 1) mere knowledge that the accomplice's assistance will help in the commission of the offense, to 2) the accomplice's own intent to commit the offense. These standards are not merely theoretical. The Model Penal Code provides examples of difficult situations in which the standard will make a difference in determining the liability of the accomplice. For example: "[a] lessor rents with knowledge that the premises will be used to establish a bordello. A vendor sells with knowledge that the subject of the sale will be used in the commission of the crime. A doctor *329 counsels against an abortion during the third trimester but, at the patient's insistence, refers her to a competent abortionist." [FN36] In all of these situations, if the knowledge standard were used the accomplices would be liable for the substantive crime as they knew of the principal's intent to commit the core offense and assisted the principal in committing the offense. However, as none of the accomplices intended to commit the substantive offense, they would not be liable if the intent standard is used.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

These different standards also affect the policies behind accomplice liability. As previously mentioned, one of the major policies behind accomplice liability is deterrence. [FN37] The proponents of the knowledge standard argue that this standard better serves this policy concern. [FN38] They argue that crime prevention should be the main consideration in determining the mens rea requirement under accomplice liability. [FN39] One big problem with this argument is the determination of what degree of knowledge and assistance will be sufficient to deter criminal conduct. [FN40] The drafters of the Model Penal Code rejected the theory of knowing facilitation by requiring "that the actor have a purpose to promote or facilitate the offense in question." [FN41] Only when the accomplice has as his true purpose the advancement of the criminal end will he face punishment for the substantive offense. [FN42] Therefore, courts face the dilemma of either holding the accomplice liable on a mere knowledge standard, or letting the accomplice go free because he did not intend to commit the underlying crime. This either/or situation does not always provide a just outcome and has led to confusing decisions among the courts, including the federal courts.

IV. Federal Cases

Federal statute 18 U.S.C. § 2 provides: "(a) Whoever commits an offense against the United States or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces, or procures its commission, is punishable as a principal." [FN43] There is no clear federal standard for the mental element of an accomplice, and the circuits are split on this issue. However, the prevailing view is that the accomplice must have the intent to commit the underlying offense. [FN44]

*330 A. The Knowledge Standard

One early case suggested that a seller with knowledge of the buyer's criminal purpose would be liable as an aider and abettor. [FN45] In Backun v. United States, the seller sold stolen goods (that he had hidden in his closet) to a buyer for an extremely low price knowing that the buyer would transport the goods across the state line to find a better market. The seller was convicted of the "crime of transporting stolen merchandise of a value in excess of $5,000 in interstate commerce, knowing it to have been stolen, in violation of the National Stolen Property Act, 18 U.S.C.A. § 415." [FN46] The court distinguished the facts of this case from "an ordinary sale made with knowledge that the purchaser intends to use the goods purchased in the commission of a felony" because there was "evidence of direct participation of [the seller] in the criminal purpose." [FN47] However, strong language in dicta suggested that an ordinary sale made with knowledge of the buyer's intent would be sufficient to hold the accomplice liable because of one's "moral obligation to prevent the commission of a felony." [FN48] "The seller may not ignore the purpose for which the purchase is made if he is advised of that purpose, or wash his hands of the aid that he has given the perpetrator of a felony by the plea that he has merely made a sale of merchandise." [FN49]

The Fourth Circuit in United States v. Eberhardt, [FN50] also suggested that knowledge of the primary actor's crime would be a sufficient standard under which to hold the accomplice liable. In protest of the Vietnamese war, a group of four men mixed part of their blood with animal blood. Then, while one man remained in the lobby, the three other men poured the blood over selective service files. The nonparticipating accomplice was charged as an aider and abettor and convicted of willfully mutilating records in a public office of the United States. Although this accomplice's acts of giving blood and accompanying the others to the building were sufficient to indicate that he had the requisite intent for the crime, the court went even further in dicta suggesting that: "[the accomplice's] mere giving of blood with the knowledge that it would *331 be used for an unlawful purpose would be enough to convict him as an aider and abettor." [FN51]

These cases found that the societal goals of crime prevention and deterrence outweighed the negative aspects of the knowledge standard. Although the court found that the aiders and abettors possessed the requisite intent, underlying these cases is the idea that people were "under [a] moral obligation to prevent the commission of felony"; [FN52] and thus guilty knowledge may be enough to satisfy the mens rea requirement. These courts found societal safety more important than: (1) the possibility of subverting personal culpability, or (2) interference with business practices of a merchant.

B. Intent Required for Underlying Crime

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

Another line of cases has held that the accomplice must possess the required mental element for the substantive offense. The Second Circuit's decision in United States v. Peoni [FN53] is one case decided before Backun which many opinions cite as supporting the idea that the accomplice must intend to promote or facilitate the offense. In Peoni, Judge Learned Hand, after interpreting common law definitions of accomplice liability, stated:

> It will be observed that all these definitions have nothing whatever to do with the probability that the forbidden result would follow upon the accessory's conduct; and that they all demand that he in some sort associate himself with the venture, that he participate in it as in something that he wishes to bring about, that he seek by his action to make it succeed. All the words used-even the most colorless, "abet"-carry an implication of purposive attitude towards it. [FN54]

This "purposive attitude" standard is the prevailing view of the federal courts today. [FN55] However, modern federal courts continue to recognize the ambiguity that still exists with respect to the requisite mental element; they have commented that new complex statutory crimes are "causing disparate results based on conflicting ideas of accomplice liability." [FN56] In fact, many courts have encountered difficulty in interpreting the federal "aiding and abetting" statute, [FN57] and while purporting to follow Peoni, use terminology that suggest that their analysis is based on a knowledge standard.

332 One case where it seems clear that the accomplice had the intent for the substantive offense is United States v. Raper. [FN58] Here, Raper was convicted for aiding and abetting in the possession of heroin with the intent to distribute. In this case, Raper and a friend had a scheme by which Raper would collect money for drugs from the buyer. The buyer would then collect the drugs from Raper's friend, who had the drugs concealed in his underwear. It was clear that the two men had a plan, and that both acted with the required intent. However, before citing the "purposive attitude" language from Peoni, the court listed as one of the elements for aiding and abetting the offense "guilty knowledge on the part of the accused." [FN59] This dicta, like that of Backun, [FN60] is very confusing and could potentially mislead others in their search for the correct mental element required for an accomplice.

In United States v. Andrews, [FN61] Ivan Andrews' conviction under the aiding and abetting statute for a murder committed by his sister was reversed by the court. Ivan himself shot a man named Lowery. Then, Ivan's sister killed a passenger who was in Lowery's car. Ivan was convicted as an aider/abettor to the murder committed by his sister. This court listed as a necessary element under the aiding and abetting statute "that Ivan 'had the requisite intent' for [the crime]." [FN62] The court found that the jury could not infer the necessary intent from these circumstances as Ivan's mere presence and agreement to "get" Lowery was insufficient. The court then concluded that the jury could not have inferred Ivan's intent "under the natural and probable consequences doctrine," [FN63] which holds the accomplice liable for all natural and probable consequences that flow from the commission of the crime, as his sister's actions were impulsive and "went beyond that scope." [FN64] By recognizing the natural and probable consequences doctrine, it appears that the court was willing to apply a lesser standard for the mental element, although it listed as one of the elements for aiding and abetting the intent to commit the underlying crime. Even so, the court was unwilling to find that Ivan's intent could be inferred under the circumstances.

Courts have struggled with the requisite mental element for an accomplice. Federal courts moving from requiring knowledge to a greater degree of intent may signify that a higher degree of personal responsibility should be required to convict an accomplice. [FN65] However, the accomplice's lesser degree of culpability 333 should be balanced with the fact that an accomplice who assists with guilty knowledge should be deterred (even if to a lesser extent than one who intends the crime be committed). [FN66]

V. Other Jurisdictions

Much like the federal courts, states have struggled with accomplice liability and split along the same lines. Few states have kept the knowledge standard. [FN67] A majority of states, in line with the Model Penal Code, require that the accomplice have the "intent to promote or facilitate the offense." [FN68]

In the 1980's, California courts were split on what the mental element for an accomplice should be. During this period, the courts divided over jury instructions which defined principals as those who aided the crime with knowledge of the perpetrator's criminal purpose. [FN69] One line of cases made it clear that the test for aider/abettor liability was the accomplice's knowledge of the perpetrator's intent. [FN70] These courts found that the accomplice's "intent is implicit in the act of aiding with knowledge of the perpetrator's guilty state of mind." [FN71]

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

An opposite line of authority developed requiring "that [the accomplice] share the intent of the perpetrator," [FN72] and disagreeing with the "implicit intent" standard. They argued that instead of setting up a presumption where knowledge equals intent, the jury should be given the facts to decide if the prosecution had proven the accomplice's criminal intent. [FN73] One justice gave an example of a situation illustrating how inequity could result under the knowledge standard:

> A abducts a young woman with the intent to rape her, forces her into a car and starts to drive off. B, the woman's brother, rushes to his car intending to rescue his sister. C, the woman's boyfriend, jumps into 334 the passenger seat of B's automobile, pulls out a gun and says to B, "Hurry up, I'm going to kill A." B's car pursues A's vehicle with C shooting through the window at A. Clearly, B has knowledge of C's intent to murder A and is aiding in the commission of the offense by driving C. Can he be convicted of aiding and abetting in the attempted murder when his only intent is to rescue his sister? I think not. [FN74]

Rejection of the implicit intent approach was necessary to assure just results under all circumstances.

A few states still find knowledge to be sufficient. [FN75] In Washington, the mens rea required for an accomplice is "general knowledge that the principal intends to commit a crime." [FN76] In Michigan, the courts explicitly recognize "two types of aiding and abetting: (1) where the aider and abettor himself possesses the requisite specific intent for the underlying crime and (2) where the aider and abettor knows that the principal has the requisite intent." [FN77] In these states, the legislature made a determination that one who assists with guilty knowledge should be punished as a principal. [FN78] The courts express this element as "merely a general intent requirement imposed to prevent an innocent participant from becoming an aider and abettor." [FN79]

Most states however, follow the scheme of the Model Penal Code. The Model Penal Code specifies that one becomes an accomplice if he aids "with the purpose of promoting or facilitating the offense." The commentary states that this language "requires that the actor . . . have as his conscious objective the bringing about of conduct . . . [which is] criminal." [FN80] Although this definition does not explicitly state that an accomplice must have the intent for the underlying crime, a majority of states adopting this language interpret this to be the meaning. [FN81]

In finding the proper standard to apply, the state courts face the same dilemma as the federal courts. [FN82] Most states are concerned about protecting those less culpable from facing the same penalty as the actual perpetrator. [FN83] 335 This rule is more in line with general principles of criminal law. [FN84] This intent requirement aids in the fact finder's determination, as once intent is found, courts do not have to quibble over the level of assistance rendered. Today, most jurisdictions prefer this rule, and Louisiana falls in line with these jurisdictions.

VI. Louisiana

A. Generally

In Louisiana, the legal standard is that the accomplice have the intent for the underlying crime. An early Supreme Court decision which addressed the problem of setting the standard for the mental element of the accomplice was State v. Holmes. [FN85] In Holmes, the defendant, Holmes, assisted in the planning and execution of a robbery by providing the car for his threesome of criminals and helping to obtain a shotgun and shells. Holmes and a friend (with the shotgun under his coat) entered a store wearing ski masks. As Holmes tried to remove the security guard's pistol, the guard reached for his gun. Holmes' friend shouted, "[d]on't try it," and then shot the guard in the face. Holmes unholstered the pistol, retrieved the money from the store safe, and pistol whipped a customer. They then escaped and split the money.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

At trial, the court first had to define the legal requirement for an accomplice's mental state. The court found that the prosecution misstated the law when it intimated that "all that was necessary to establish the defendant's guilt of first degree murder was proof that the defendant was knowingly involved in the armed robbery." [FN86] The court found that "an individual may only be convicted as a principal for those crimes for which he personally has the requisite mental state." [FN87] Since the mental element for first degree murder is "specific intent to kill or to inflict great bodily harm [[[,]" [FN88] Holmes himself must have had the specific intent to kill the guard, and his friend's intent could not be transferred to him. The court then concluded that the factual circumstances were sufficient to find that Holmes had the specific intent required. [FN89] Later cases state that 336 they are following the same standard. Since the mental requirement of a given crime affects the analysis, these cases will be divided by looking at those crimes which, under Louisiana law, require "specific intent," and those which require "general intent."

B. Specific Intent Crimes

"Specific intent" is defined in Louisiana Revised Statutes 14:10(1) as "that state of mind which exists when . . . the offender actively desired the prescribed criminal consequences to follow his act or failure to act." [FN90] Therefore, "specific intent is present when from the circumstances the offender must have subjectively desired the prohibited result. . . ." [FN91] In order to determine the defendant's mental state his actions will have to be scrutinized, thereby making this a fact-intensive inquiry.

In State v. Pierre, [FN92] the Supreme Court reversed the defendant's conviction for manslaughter after finding that he did not have the specific intent to kill the victim. Here, defendant was tried for the second degree murder of a thirteen year old boy. [FN93] The facts surrounding the victim's rape and murder were sketchy, and contradictory testimony was given about the defendant's involvement. All that could be proven was that defendant was at the scene (there was contradictory testimony about whether defendant was in the house where the victim was raped or remained in a van), and there was no evidence that he aided in the murder (he did not participate in the victim's beating death). The court found there were no acts from which intent could be inferred, 337 and that the "jurors could only speculate about the defendant's role" in the murder. [FN94]

Compare Pierre to State v. Meyers. [FN95] This case involved the drive-by shooting of a street corner drug dealer. The driver and the backseat passenger appealed their convictions of second degree murder, claiming that they lacked the specific intent to kill. The court once again defined the legal standard as the intent required for the underlying crime. Next, the court looked at the circumstances surrounding the crime and determined that the defendants did have the specific intent to kill. However, given the facts of the case the court's holding might be questioned.

In analyzing the case, the court found the following facts sufficient to infer the defendants' intent:

> neither [the driver] nor [the passenger] tried to assist the victim . . . after the shooting. They did not call the police to report the shooting or give any statement regarding the murder to anyone. [The driver] drove the Cutlass to the scene and [the passenger] watched the incident [through] the car window. [FN96]

The court acknowledged that there was "no direct evidence presented that either [man] knew that [the perpetrator] was armed"; however, it found that in the life of drug dealers this was a common event and that "the participants here all knew that [the perpetrator] intended to shoot [the victim]." [FN97]

In affirming the jury's decision, the court emphasized the fact that the defendants did not offer the victim assistance after the shooting as evidence of the defendants' intent. Such an inference of intent from nonaction could lead to troubling results, given that other inferences can also be drawn from the facts. For example, the defendants could have neglected to make a report for fear of prosecution. The state presented no evidence that either Meyers or Davis knew that the shooter was armed. Meyers and Davis could have merely intended to participate in a drug deal. Even if they knew of the perpetrator's intent to kill this is different from having the intent themselves. As the court itself stated, "it is not enough to find merely that [the perpetrator] had the necessary mental state, since this intent cannot be imputed to the accused." [FN98] However, the court found the circumstantial evidence sufficient to support the jury's finding of guilt.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

The mere presence of a passenger in Meyers is especially similar to Pierre in which the defendant's mental state was not sufficient to hold him liable as an aider and abettor. There, the crime committed was just as heinous, but the court did not consider the defendant's failure to assist the victim or file a report. In *338 Meyers, the court offers little justification for its failure to reverse the jury's determination. This is another example of a court confusing the legal standard by suggesting that knowledge of the perpetrator's intent is sufficient, while giving contradictory statements about requiring intent for the underlying crime. The court was willing to allow the jury to infer the defendant's "implicit intent" from his knowledge of the perpetrator's conduct. In Meyers, the court used the defendant's knowledge as a factor in determining intent, an analysis which would be more appropriate in finding accomplice liability for a general intent crime.

C. General Intent Crimes

Different proof of the mental state of the accomplice is required for general intent crimes. General intent is defined as the state of mind which exists "when the circumstances indicate that the offender, in the ordinary course of human experience, must have adverted to the prescribed criminal consequences as reasonably certain to result from his act or failure to act." [FN99] Therefore, "general intent exists when from the circumstances the prohibited result may reasonably be expected to follow from the offender's voluntary act, irrespective of any subjective desire to have accomplished such result." [FN100] Since the consequences only have to be "reasonably certain" to occur in general intent crimes, it will be less difficult to find that an accomplice has the requisite mental state for these types of crimes.

Two cases which illustrate how accomplice liability works with general intent crimes are State v. Smith [FN101] and State v. Hebert. [FN102] In Smith, the court reversed the defendant's conviction for armed robbery. [FN103] Two brothers were robbing a shoe store when one found a hammer behind a counter and used it to threaten the clerks. The brother who did not wield the hammer was convicted by the lower court as a principal to armed robbery. The appellate court focused on the fact that this brother did not aid or abet the other's use of the hammer.

However, in Hebert, the court upheld the defendant's conviction for armed robbery, finding the defendant did have the requisite mental element. There, the second circuit found the perpetrator's use of a gun was planned or reasonably expected to follow from the plan to rob the store. As Smith and Hebert illustrate, as long as some act points towards assistance given by the accomplice *339 to the perpetrator, courts will generally hold that the accomplice has the requisite mental element.

VII. Suggestions/Solutions

A. Type of Knowing Aid Given by the Accomplice

Many solutions have been given for providing a balance between deterrence and personal culpability. One solution would involve taking into account the degree to which the accomplice knowingly aided in the criminal scheme. [FN104] The initial drafters of the Model Penal Code made this suggestion, but it was rejected. [FN105] The benefit of taking into account the amount of aid given by the accomplice would be to limit the liability of the minor actor. [FN106] However, critics of this standard have argued that it is too vague. [FN107] Dressler argues that it will be hard for a jury to determine what "substantial" help is and thus, the intent requirement for the accomplice will remain a hazy one. [FN108]

B. Sentencing Guidelines

One way to avoid penalizing the less culpable accomplice to the same degree as the principal is through sentencing guidelines. [FN109] The jury must find the elements of the core offense present. Yet, the judge in his discretion applies the sentencing guidelines to determine the defendant's punishment.

Federal courts follow the Federal Sentencing Guidelines Manual promulgated by the United States Sentencing Commission. [FN110] Under these guidelines, "each offense has a corresponding base offense level and may have one or more specific offense characteristics that adjust the offense level upward or downward." [FN111] A judge begins with the offense level, and then adds or subtracts points from it according to the aggravating or mitigating circumstances in order to determine the punishment. Under the guidelines, an aider and abetter's 340 "offense level is the same level as that for the underlying offense." [FN112] However, the judge may consider as a mitigating factor whether the defendant was a minimal or minor participant in determining whether to decrease the offense level. [FN113]

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

In Louisiana, the trial judge must consider Louisiana Code of Criminal Procedure article 894.1, which contains general sentencing guidelines, before imposing a sentence. [FN114] Where there is no mandatory minimum sentence, "[t] he trial judge is to be afforded wide discretion in the imposition of the sentences within statutory limits, and the sentence imposed should not be set aside in the absence of a manifest abuse of his discretion." [FN115] "The purpose of this article is to provide the trial court with standards so that it may individualize the sentence to fit the particular defendant . . . ." [FN116] Therefore, the judge may consider the mitigating fact that the defendant was only an accomplice.

A major criticism of accomplice liability is that the accomplice is being punished to the same extent as the actual perpetrator. [FN117] Under the sentencing guidelines, the judge in his discretion may determine that the accomplice was less blameworthy and therefore should receive a lesser punishment. One problem with sentencing guidelines may be that they allow the judge too much discretion if no mandatory minimum sentence exists. However, such guidelines give standards for sentencing "through a system that imposes appropriately different sentences for criminal conduct of differing severity." [FN118]

C. Criminal Facilitation Statutes

Some states make "assistance" a distinct criminal offense by promulgating facilitation statutes. [FN119] "These extend accessorial liability to persons who engage in conduct with the awareness that it will aid others to commit serious crimes, but treat such facilitation as a less grave offense than the crimes that are aided." [FN120] A statute such as this would "have the advantage of providing means whereby such persons, clearly less culpable than those directly participating in the crime, could be subjected to lesser and different penalties, just as has long been the case for the accessory after the fact." [FN121] Also, the Final Report of the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws recognized the 341 difficulty that the courts were facing by drafting a criminal facilitation statute and commenting that: "This section . . . would provide a legislative solution to the dilemma faced by a court which has to choose between holding a facilitator as a full accomplice or absolving him completely of criminal liability." [FN122] The standard adopted under this statute is that of the "knowing substantial assistance" of the accomplice. Thus, there is still the problem of determining when assistance has reached a "substantial" level. [FN123] However, this statute provides a standard that will produce just results by recognizing that the accomplice in this situation should be punished for his guilty knowledge and assistance, but to a lesser degree than the actual perpetrator.

VIII. Assisting Reckless/Negligent Conduct

A. In General

Whether to punish someone who assists the perpetrator in committing a criminally negligent crime is another problem that the courts have faced in the context of accomplice liability. [FN124] This situation often arises in the context of drunken driving offenses where the owner of a car gives the keys to someone obviously intoxicated. [FN125] Most courts hold that one can be charged as an accomplice to a recklessness/negligence crime; [FN126] however, a few courts find that this is a legal impossibility and refuse to allow accomplice liability. [FN127] In a negligence crime, such as negligent homicide, the drunk driver (the principal) 342 does not necessarily intend to commit the crime, therefore the requirement that the accomplice have the intent to commit the underlying crime seems inconsistent in this type of scenario.

B. Other Jurisdictions

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

1. Legal Impossibility

In State v. Etzweiler, [FN128] the New Hampshire court found that Etzweiler could not be charged as an accomplice to negligent homicide. [FN129] Etzweiler loaned his car to a co-employee whom he knew to be drunk. Ten minutes later, the co-employee who was driving recklessly struck a car, killing its two passengers. In rejecting the indictment charging Etzweiler as an accomplice to negligent homicide, the court recognized that the New Hampshire statute is based upon the Model Penal Code. [FN130] This court read Section III and Section IV of the New Hampshire statute together to find that under the code, "an accomplice's liability ought not to extend beyond the criminal purposes that he or she shares." [FN131] The court found that it would be a legal impossibility for Etzweiler to be an accomplice to negligent homicide:

> To satisfy the requirements of RSA 626:8 III, the State must establish that Etzweiler's acts were designed to aid [the co-employee] in committing negligent homicide. Yet under the negligent homicide statute, [the principal] must be unaware of the risk of death that his conduct created. . . . We cannot see how Etzweiler could intentionally aid [the 343 principal] in a crime that [the principal] was unaware that he was committing. [FN132]

So, although Etzweiler loaned his car to an intoxicated person, he faced no consequences for those actions. [FN133]

2. Permissible Result

Other states take a differing view and hold that one can be convicted as an accomplice to negligence crimes. The Colorado Supreme Court in People v. Wheeler [FN134] reversed the trial court's finding that criminally negligent homicide by an accomplice is not a cognizable crime. [FN135] The trial court found that since the accomplice must know that the principal intended to commit the crime, it would be impossible for the complicitor to know that the "principal intended to perpetrate an unintentional killing." [FN136] However, the supreme court recognized that the complicity statute does not prescribe a separate crime, but is a definitional statute, and that the "intent to promote or facilitate the commission of the offense" of which the statute speaks is the intent to promote or facilitate the act or conduct of the principal. [FN137]

> Therefore, for a person to be guilty of criminally negligent homicide through a theory of complicity, he need not know that death will result from the principal's conduct because the principal need not know that. However, the complicitor must be aware that the principal is engaging in conduct that grossly deviates from the standard of reasonable care and poses a substantial and unjustifiable risk of death to another. In addition, he must aid or abet the principal in that conduct and, finally, death must result from that conduct. [FN138]

344 New York was faced with a similar case in People v. Abbott. [FN139] Here, two men were drag racing down a public road when one of their cars struck a nonparticipating vehicle, killing all of its occupants. The driver of the car that avoided the collision was convicted of criminally negligent homicide. As in Wheeler, the state argued that this driver was liable because he "intentionally aided . . . in the criminally negligent conduct which resulted in the deaths . . . ." [FN140] The court found that to hold one liable as an accomplice for the crime of criminally negligent homicide, the State must prove: (1) that the accomplice "shares the requisite culpable mental state for the crime" (here criminal negligence), and (2) that he "intentionally [aided] in its commission." [FN141] Here, the speed of the driver's vehicle and the fact that his conduct allowed the events to take place were sufficient to show that the legal standard was met.

C. Louisiana

In State v. Martin, [FN142] a case factually similar to Abbott, the Louisiana Supreme Court upheld a drag-racing defendant's conviction for negligent homicide. The court found that the state must prove that the accomplice was: "1) criminally negligent and thereby had the requisite mental state; and 2) 'concerned' in the commission of a negligent homicide." [FN143] The court further found no error with the jury's conclusion that the requirement of both prongs had been met. [FN144] Louisiana courts have analyzed this situation by holding the "accomplice" liable for his own conduct. Therefore, the accomplice's liability lies in his own reckless mental state and action.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

Thus, in a case of loaning a car to a drunk driver, the issue would apparently be whether one was grossly negligent in engaging in that conduct. Another factor in the independent liability analysis is causation. The Martin opinion, in an apparently favorable reference to State v. Petersen, [FN145] suggests that the defendant might not be liable for negligent homicide if a co-racer were killed, rather than a third person. [FN146] Similarly, one could determine whether the supplier of the car or the weapon was a substantial cause in producing the result.

*345 D. Solutions

Many of the same policies for and against finding accomplice liability previously discussed apply to negligence crimes. [FN147] Crime deterrence policies suggest that the accomplice should be held liable. The owner of the car will think twice before recklessly handing over his or her car keys to a drunk. However, there has been criticism that "[b]ecause aiding and abetting so clearly requires knowing and willful participation in an offense with an intent that the offense succeed, expanding the doctrine to reach an offense based on negligence marks a radical departure from precedent." [FN148]

Some states look to the actual statute on accomplice liability to find that the accomplice must intend the commission of the offense. [FN149] However, that statute alone does not impose liability. This analysis leads to the anomalous conclusion that the accomplice must intend an unintentional crime-a legal impossibility. The better rule will require courts to examine the underlying crime to define the mental element for the accomplice. The prosecution will have to prove that the accomplice was negligent in aiding the conduct of the perpetrator. In a negligence crime, the state of mind of the accomplice must be a gross deviation from the standard of care of a reasonable man under similar circumstances. [FN150] Another approach would be to bypass the complicity theory and to hold the "accomplice" liable for his own conduct. [FN151]

IX. Conclusion

A person may be convicted of a crime he or she did not physically commit or intend to commit. The standard of knowledge versus intent of the accomplice towards the core offense is determinative of accomplice liability in some scenarios. The example in which a merchant sells goods to a buyer knowing that the buyer intends to use the goods to commit a crime can be analyzed under different theoretical bases for imposing accomplice liability. The seller cannot be seen as a consenting party under an agency theory. Neither has the seller "forfeited" his or her personal identity. Nevertheless, the seller has, however remotely, caused harm to society. This harm and the deterrence needed to prevent it has to be balanced with the seller's own personal culpability.

Punishing the less culpable accomplice to a lesser degree could be achieved by legislative enactment of a facilitation statute. With such a statute, the jury *346 would get to determine if the accomplice met the elements of this lesser offense. The same result would be achieved through the use of sentencing guidelines where the accomplice's minor role could be considered a mitigating factor. However, with this solution, it is within the discretion of the judge to determine the defendant's punishment. Either method would achieve the goals of deterrence without compromising the principle of personal culpability.

With respect to negligence crimes, the best result would be to hold the accomplice liable if he or she aided the perpetrator's conduct with a reckless state of mind. This solution would have the consequence of holding liable those whose actions show disregard for life but who do not actually commit the crime. As some commentators have argued, this is like holding the person liable for the substantive crime. [FN152] When these changes are implemented, both policies of deterrence and holding one liable only for one's own personal culpability will be met.

[FN1]. See William Lawrence Clark and William L. Marshall, A Treatise on the Law of Crimes § 5.00, at 260-67 (7th ed. 1967). Note that there is no mens rea requirement for a strict liability offense or felony murder. Id. § 5.10, at 303-13. See also Rollin M. Perkins, Criminal Law § 1, at 67-72 (3d ed. 1982).

3300

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

[FN2]. See 2 Wayne R. Lafave & Austin W. Scott, Jr., Criminal Law § 6.7, at 576 (2d ed. 1986).

[FN3]. See Grace E. Mueller, Note, The Mens Rea of Accomplice Liability, 61 S. Cal. L. Rev. 2169, 2169-70 (1988).

[FN4]. Id. at 2172.

[FN5]. The Louisiana Criminal Code does not use the term "accomplice." The Code provides: "All persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether present or absent, and whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, aid and abet in its commission, or directly or indirectly counsel or procure another to commit the crime, are principals." La. R.S. 14:24 (1997). Similarly the federal statute provides: "(a) Whoever commits an offense against the United States or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces, or procures its commission, is punishable as a principal." 18 U.S.C. § 2 (1994). In other states and in the Model Penal Code, the term "accomplice" is defined by statute, and for the purposes of this paper the term "accomplice" will be used to identify an aider or abettor to a crime (a person who in Louisiana would be a "principal").

[FN6]. See Mueller, supra note 3, at 2172.

[FN7]. Parties were divided into four categories: "(1) principal in the first degree, (2) principal in the second degree, (3) accessory before the fact, and (4) accessory after the fact." Perkins, supra note 1, at 727.

[FN8]. Id. at 738.

[FN9]. Id. at 743. (Perkins states: "If the charge is first degree murder based upon an alleged deliberate and premeditated killing, the abettor is not guilty of this degree of the crime unless he either acted upon a premeditated design to cause the death of the deceased or knew that the perpetrator was acting with such an intent, and the same may be said of an assault with an intent to kill." (emphasis added) (footnotes omitted)).

[FN10]. See Louis Westerfield, The Mens Rea Requirement of Accomplice Liability in American Criminal Law-Knowledge or Intent, 51 Miss. L.J. 177, 177-79 (1980).

[FN11]. Id.

[FN12]. See Joshua Dressler, Reassessing the Theoretical Underpinnings of Accomplice Liability: New Solutions To An Old Problem, 37 Hastings L.J. 91, 111 (1985).

[FN13]. Westerfield, supra note 10, at 178.

[FN14]. Id.

[FN15]. Dressler, supra note 12, at 113.

[FN16]. Id. at 112-13. For example, in a juvenile gang, the leader may be the most dangerous, and therefore "less easily deterrable than other accomplices." This type of accomplice may need "greater punishment" than his or her followers in order to be deterred.

[FN17]. Id. at 113.

[FN18]. Westerfield, supra note 10, at 177.

[FN19]. Dressler, supra note 12, at 108.

[FN20]. Westerfield, supra note 10, at 176.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

[FN21]. Id. See also Dressler, supra note 12; Mueller, supra note 3.

[FN22]. See Dressler, supra note 12, at 111. See also Glanville Williams, Criminal Law: The General Part § 126, at 381-83 (2d ed. 1961).

[FN23]. Warren A. Seavey, Handbook of the Law of Agency § 8, at 11 (1964).

[FN24]. Dressler, supra note 12, at 110.

[FN25]. Id. (footnotes omitted).

[FN26]. Id. at 111.

[FN27]. Id.

[FN28]. Id. at 116 ("Yet, it is precisely because the criminal justice system stigmatizes the guilty and metes out punishment for wrongdoing that the common law usually rejects forfeiture, and instead evaluates legal guilt and apportions punishment based on the degree of personal responsibility . . . . Rejection of the forfeiture doctrine makes it less likely that criminals will be treated inhumanely, or that rights perceived as fundamental will be denied.").

[FN29]. Id. at 102.

[FN30]. Id. at 108. See also Sanford H. Kadish, Complicity, Cause, and Blame: A Study in the Interpretation of Doctrine, 73 Calif. L. Rev. 323, 329-36 (noting that causation cannot be used to blame the accomplice as the perpetrator's free will is the cause of the harm).

[FN31]. Dressler, supra note 12, at 111.

[FN32]. Dressler, supra note 12, at 108.

[FN33]. Mueller, supra note 3, at 2174-76.

[FN34]. See supra text accompanying notes 7-9.

[FN35]. Mueller, supra note 3, at 2173-74; Westerfield, supra note 10, at 172-73; see also Model Penal Code § 2.06 commentary at 312 n.42 (1985) ("if anything, the culpability level for the accomplice should be higher than that of the principal actor, because there is generally more ambiguity in the overt conduct engaged in by the accomplice, and thus a higher risk of convicting the innocent.").

[FN36]. Model Penal Code § 2.06 commentary at 316 (1985).

[FN37]. See supra text accompanying notes 10-18.

[FN38]. Westerfield, supra note 10, at 177.

[FN39]. Id.

[FN40]. Model Penal Code § 2.06 commentary at 315-16 (1985).

[FN41]. Model Penal Code § 2.06(3)(a) commentary at 314 (1985).

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

[FN42]. Model Penal Code § 2.06 commentary at 318 (1985) (The Institute favored this narrow formulation over a broad standard of knowledge "in order not to include situations where liability [would be] inappropriate.").

[FN43]. 18 U.S.C. § 2 (1994).

[FN44]. See, e.g., infra text accompanying notes 53-66.

[FN45]. Backun v. United States, 112 F.2d 635 (4th Cir. 1940). See also Bacon v. United States, 127 F.2d 985 (10th Cir. 1942) (affirming Bacon's conviction for transporting intoxicating liquor). Bacon was the owner of a liquor store which sold whiskey to Fox, a bootlegger. The court specified the degree of knowledge required of the seller by stating that: "Mere possibility or suspicion that goods lawful in themselves might be used unlawfully is not enough to make one an aider and abettor. More is required than that. He must know or have reason to know that the goods which he sells are and will be used in an unlawful venture." Id. at 987.

[FN46]. Id. at 636.

[FN47]. Id. at 638.

[FN48]. Id. at 637.

[FN49]. Id. at 637. See also Borgia v. United States, 78 F.2d 550, 555 (9th Cir. 1935); Vukich v. United States, 28 F.2d 666, 669 (9th Cir. 1928); Anstess v. United States, 22 F.2d 594, 595 (7th Cir. 1927); Pattis v. United States, 17 F.2d 562, 566 (9th Cir. 1927).

[FN50]. United States v. Eberhardt, 417 F.2d 1009, 1013 (4th Cir. 1969).

[FN51]. Id. at 1013.

[FN52]. Backun, 112 F.2d at 637.

[FN53]. 100 F.2d 401 (2d Cir. 1938).

[FN54]. Id. at 402 (emphasis added).

[FN55]. See Lafave, supra note 2, at 583 (stating that other courts "have tended to accept the Peoni limitation on accomplice liability").

[FN56]. United States v. Hill, 55 F.3d 1197, 1200 (6th Cir. 1995).

[FN57]. 18 U.S.C. § 2 (1994).

[FN58]. 676 F.2d 841 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

[FN59]. Id. at 849 (citing United States v. Staten, 581 F.2d 878, 886-87 (D.C. Cir. 1978)) (emphasis added).

[FN60]. See supra text accompanying notes 45-49.

[FN61]. 75 F.3d 552 (9th Cir. 1996).

[FN62]. Id. at 555.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

[FN63]. Id. at 556. Under the natural and probable consequences doctrine the accomplice is liable for all natural and probable consequences of the criminal scheme which he encouraged or aided. Lafave, supra note 2, at 590.

[FN64]. Id.

[FN65]. See supra text accompanying notes 45-63. This move takes place chronologically from earlier cases such as Backun and Eberhardt (which suggested that knowledge of the accomplice would be sufficient) to later cases like Raper (where accomplice had to intend the crime).

[FN66]. See Westerfield, supra note 10, at 182.

[FN67]. Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 9A.08.020(3)(a)(ii) (West 1988) provides that "a person is an accomplice of another person in the commission of a crime if: With knowledge that it will promote or facilitate the commission of the crime, he . . . aids or agrees to aid such other person in planning or committing it." See also 17 Cal. Jur. 3d (Rev.) Part 1, Criminal Law § 105.

[FN68]. See Ala. Code § 13A-2-23 (1994); Ark. Code Ann. § 5-2-403 (Michie 1997); Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 18-1-603 (West Supp. 1997); Del. Code Ann., tit.11, § 271 (1995); Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 702-222 (Michie 1994); N.D. Cent. Code § 12.1-03-01 (1997); Ore. Rev. Stat. § 161.155(2) (1990); Pa. Stat. Ann. tit. 18, § 306(c)(1) (West 1998).

[FN69]. People v. Green, 181 Cal. Rptr. 507, 509-10 (Cal. Ct. App. 1982).

[FN70]. Id. at 510; People v. Standifer, 113 Cal. Rptr. 653 (Cal. Ct. App. 1974); People v. Germany, 116 Cal. Rptr. 841 (Cal. Ct. App. 1974).

[FN71]. Green, 181 Cal. Rptr. at 510-11 (emphasis added).

[FN72]. People v. Yarber, 153 Cal. Rptr. 875 (Cal. Ct. App. 1979); People v. Petty, 179 Cal. Rptr. 413 (Cal. Ct. App. 1981); People v. Brown, 172 Cal. Rptr. 221 (Cal. Ct. App. 1981).

[FN73]. Green, 181 Cal. Rptr. at 515 (Miller, J., concurring).

[FN74]. Id. at 515 (Miller concurring).

[FN75]. State v. Mas, No.33802-1-I, 1997 WL 258450 (Wash. Ct. App. May 19, 1997); State v. Bockman, 682 P.2d 925 (Wash. Ct. App. 1984); People v. King, 534 N.W.2d 534 (Mich. Ct. App. 1995); People v. Partridge, 535 N.W.2d 251 (Mich. Ct. App. 1995).

[FN76]. Mas, 1997 WL 258450 at 7.

[FN77]. King, 534 N.W.2d at 536-37.

[FN78]. Mas, 1997 WL 258450 at 8.

[FN79]. King, 534 N.W.2d at 538 (citing People v. Karst, 360 N.W.2d 206 (Mich. 1984)).

[FN80]. Model Penal Code § 2.06, Comments, at 310 (1985).

[FN81]. See State v. Easton, 577 S.W.2d 953 (Mo. Ct. App. 1979); State v. Soares, 815 P.2d 428, (Haw. 1991); Robinson v. State, 665 S.W.2d 890 (Ark. Ct. App. 1984). See also Mueller, supra note 3, at 2177-82 (giving examples of problems with interpreting the Model Penal Code).

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

[FN82]. See supra text accompanying notes 43-66.

[FN83]. See supra text accompanying notes 72-74.

[FN84]. See supra text accompanying note 19.

[FN85]. State v. Holmes, 388 So. 2d 722 (La. 1980). See also State v. McAllister, 366 So. 2d 1340 (La. 1978). In State v. McAllister the court affirmed the defendant's conviction of manslaughter and disagreed with the defendant's challenge that Louisiana Revised Statutes 14:24 was vague, over broad, and denied equal protection and due process. The court reiterated the fact that the person is not charged with violating Louisiana Revised Statutes 14:24 as this statute merely defines principals; however, the person is charged with the substantive offense. The statute defining the substantive offense determines the mental element.

[FN86]. Holmes, 388 So. 2d at 725.

[FN87]. Id. at 726.

[FN88]. La. R.S. 14:30 (1997).

[FN89]. Holmes, 388 So. 2d at 728 ("[S]pecific intent is a state of mind and, as such, it need not be proven as a fact, but may be inferred from the circumstances of the transaction and the actions of the defendant." (citing State v. Williams, 383 So. 2d 369 (La. 1980)). La. R.S. 15:438 (1992) provides: "The rule as to circumstantial evidence is: assuming every fact to be proved that the evidence tends to prove, in order to convict, it must exclude every reasonable hypothesis of innocence."

Holmes, 388 So. 2d at 728 (Marcus, J., concurring in the result) (Marcus, without reasoning, questioned the legal standard imposed by the majority of requiring the principal to have the intent of the substantive statute.) (Dennis, J., dissenting) (Dennis agreed with the legal standard imposed by the majority but found that under the facts Holmes did not have the requisite specific intent. He found that Holmes' act of "attempting to unholster the guard's pistol" was more consistent with sparing his life. Also, Holmes had no time to object to his friend's actions. Lastly, Holmes would not have wanted the shot fired since Holmes was standing right beside the guard.). The disagreement between the majority and the dissent show just how difficult it can be to infer a person's mental element from the surrounding circumstances even if one agrees with the legal standard.

[FN90]. La. R.S. 14:10(1) (1997) (emphasis added).

[FN91]. Holmes, 388 So. 2d at 726 (quoting State v. Daniels, 109 So. 2d 896, 899 (La.1959)).

[FN92]. State v. Pierre, 631 So. 2d 427 (La. 1994). Compare to State v. Jasper, 677 So. 2d 553 (La. App. 2d Cir. 1996), writ denied, 688 So. 2d 521 (1997), reh'g denied, 693 So. 2d 790 (1997), where court found that the defendant did have the specific intent to kill required for second degree murder. The court distinguished Pierre by finding that there, the defendant grabbed a weapon and went looking for the victim. More importantly, witnesses saw defendant shooting into the car in which the victim was a passenger.

[FN93]. La. R.S. 14:30.1(1) (1997).

[FN94]. Pierre, 631 So. 2d at 429.

[FN95]. State v. Meyers, 683 So. 2d 1378 (La. App. 5th Cir. 1996).

[FN96]. Id. at 1384.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

[FN97]. Id. at 1384 (emphasis added).

[FN98]. Id. at 1382 (citing State v. Holmes, 388 So. 2d 722 (La. 1980)).

[FN99]. La. R.S. 14:10(2) (1997) (emphasis added).

[FN100]. Holmes, 388 So. 2d at 726 (quoting State v. Daniel, 109 So. 2d 896, 899 (La. 1959) (overruled on other grounds)).

[FN101]. 450 So. 2d 714 (La. App. 4th Cir. 1984), [FN102]. 688 So. 2d 612 (La. App. 2d Cir. 1997).

[FN103]. Smith, 450 So. 2d at 716. State v. Battieste, 597 So. 2d 508 (La. App. 1st Cir. 1992), vacated in part on other grounds, 604 So. 2d 960 (La. 1992) (stating that armed robbery is a general intent crime, citing State v. Payne, 540 So. 2d 520 (La. App. 1st Cir., writ denied, 546 So. 2d 169 (La. 1989)).

[FN104]. See Dressler, supra note 12, at 121-24.

[FN105]. Model Penal Code § 2.04(3)(b), Tentative Draft No. 1 (1953).

[FN106]. Id. at cmt. 3. See also Lafave, supra note 2, at 583.

[FN107]. See Lafave, supra note 2, at 584 (citing Model Penal Code § 2.06, cmt. 6(c) n.58 (1985)).

[FN108]. Dressler, supra note 12, at 122. However, difficult determinations are left to the common sense of the jury all of the time. Dressler instead has suggested that the test should be whether the accomplice caused the crime. Id. at 140. "A causal accomplice is one but for whose acts of assistance the social harm would not have occurred when it did." Id. at 124-25. If the accomplice did not cause the crime, then he would receive a lesser punishment. Dressler proposes that the element of causation be added to the test in order to "make persons guilty of the harm they cause." Id. at 125-26. However, this formulation does not clarify the requisite mental element of the accomplice as the degree of culpability must still be determined.

[FN109]. See U.S. Sentencing Guidelines Manual (1997).

[FN110]. Id.

[FN111]. Id. at Ch. 2, intro. comment (1995).

[FN112]. Id. at § 2X2.1.

[FN113]. Id. at § 3B1.2.

[FN114]. La. Code Crim. P. art. 894.1.

[FN115]. State v. Stoner, 438 So. 2d 1275, 1276 (La. App. 2d Cir. 1983), writ denied, 444 So. 2d 118 (1984) (citing State v. Abercrumbia, 412 So. 2d 1027 (La. 1982).

[FN116]. Id. at 1277.

[FN117]. See Mueller, supra note 3, at 2172.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

[FN118]. U.S. Sentencing Guidelines Manual Ch. 1, Pt. A, intro. comment (1995).

[FN119]. Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 506.080 (Banks-Baldwin 1995); N.Y. Penal Law §§ 115.00-115.15 (McKinney 1998).

[FN120]. Model Penal Code § 2.06, cmt. 6(c) (1985).

[FN121]. Lafave, supra note 2, at 584.

[FN122]. National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws, Final Report-Proposed New Federal Criminal Code § 1002 commentary at 68 (1971). Section 1002 defines criminal facilitation as requiring: (1) knowing substantial assistance to a person intending to commit a felony; (2) that the other person commit the contemplated crime or a like or related felony; and (3) that the assistance provided be in fact employed in committing the crime.

[FN123]. See supra text accompanying notes 104-108.

[FN124]. La. R.S. 14:12 (1997) reads in full: "Criminal negligence exists when, although neither specific nor general criminal intent is present, there is such disregard of the interest of others that the offender's conduct amounts to a gross deviation below the standard of care expected to be maintained by a reasonably careful man under like circumstances."

[FN125]. See Mueller, supra note 3, at 2189.

[FN126]. State v. Garza, 916 P.2d 9 (Kan. 1996); People v. Wheeler, 772 P.2d 101 (Colo. 1989); People v. Abbott, 445 N.Y.S.2d 344 (N.Y. App. Div. 1981).

[FN127]. Echols v. State, 818 P.2d 691 (Alaska Ct. App. 1991); State v. Etzweiler, 480 A.2d 870 (N.H. 1984). The Model Penal Code section 2.06(4) purports to provide for this situation by "[making] it clear that complicity in conduct causing a particular criminal result entails accountability for that result so long as the accomplice is personally culpable with respect to the result to the extent demanded by the definition of the crime." Model Penal Code § 2.06, cmt. 7 (1985) (emphasis added). Model Penal Code section 2.06(4) states: "When causing a particular result is an element of an offense, an accomplice in the conduct causing such result is an accomplice in the commission of that offense if he acts with the kind of culpability, if any, with respect to that result that is sufficient for the commission of the offense."

[FN128]. 480 A.2d 870, 875 (N.H. 1984).

[FN129]. See also Echols v. State, 818 P.2d 691 (Alaska Ct. App. 1991) where the court reversed the defendant's conviction of assault in the first degree. The defendant was charged under Alaska's complicity statute for soliciting the assault. Alaska Stat. § 11.16.110(2) (Michie 1996) requires the accomplice have the intent to promote the commission of the offense. The mental element for the substantive offense of the assault required "that [the] person recklessly causes serious physical injury . . . ." Alaska Stat. § 11.41.200 (a)(1) (Michie 1996). The court started with the premise that "the accomplice must intend the commission of the particular crime charged." Echols, 812 P.2d at 692. The court then pointed out that although the Model Penal Code is one of the sources of the Alaska criminal code that their code had no provision similar to the Model Penal Code section 2.06(4). The court admitted that if such a provision was enacted it would support the State's position that the defendant need only act with recklessness towards the conduct causing the result. Echols, 818 P.2d at 695.

[FN130]. N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 626:8 III (Michie 1996) provides: "A person is an accomplice of another person in the commission of an offense if: (a) With the purpose of promoting or facilitating the commission of the offense, he . . . aids . . . such other person in planning or committing it." Etzweiler, 480 A.2d at 873. N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 626:8 IV (Michie 1996) states: "When causing a particular result is an element of an offense, an accomplice in the conduct causing such result is an accomplice in the commission of that offense, if he acts with the kind of culpability, if any, with respect to that result that is sufficient for the commission of the offense." Etzweiler, 480 A.2d at 874.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

5934

[FN131]. Etzweiler, 480 A.2d at 874.

[FN132]. Id. at 874-75.

[FN133]. Other Justices found that the accomplice liability statute could be interpreted differently. Justice Souter, concurring, found that Section IV of the statute should be read separately from Section III, therefore providing for liability in a situation where the "accomplice in 'conduct' causing a particular result is also an accomplice in the commission of the offense defined by reference to that result." However, he found that Section IV was too unclear as to "give . . . notice of its intended effect and is thus unenforceable." 480 A.2d at 876. Chief Justice King, dissenting, found that Section IV was sufficiently clear and that it would permit the State to charge Etzweiler as an accomplice to negligent homicide. He stated that the provision required the accomplice to act "purposefully with respect to the principal's criminal conduct," and that the accomplice must have the same state of mind as the principal towards the result (here, criminal negligence). 480 A.2d at 881 (emphasis in original). This Justice felt that this interpretation was the only way to give meaning to both Section III and Section IV.

[FN134]. 772 P.2d 101 (Colo. 1989).

[FN135]. Id. at 104-05.

[FN136]. Id. at 105.

[FN137]. Id. at 104 (emphasis added).

[FN138]. Id. at 105.

[FN139]. People v. Abbot, 445 N.Y.S.2d 344 (N.Y. App. Div. 1981). See also State v. Garza, 916 P.2d 9 (Kan. 1996). Garza and another man were shooting at each other when a bullet from the other man's gun hit the victim. Garza was charged with aggravated battery. The court found that "[g]iving assistance or encouragement to one who it is known will thereby engage in conduct dangerous to life is sufficient for accomplice liability as an aider or abettor as to crimes defined in terms of recklessness or negligence." Id. at 15.

[FN140]. Abbott, 445 N.Y.S.2d at 346.

[FN141]. Id. at 346-47.

[FN142]. 539 So. 2d 1235 (La. 1989).

[FN143]. Id. at 1238.

[FN144]. Id.

[FN145]. 526 P.2d 1008 (Or. 1974) (manslaughter conviction reversed where victim was a knowing and voluntary participant in drag race).

[FN146]. Martin, 539 So. 2d at 1239.

[FN147]. See supra text accompanying notes 7-32.

[FN148]. Major Frank W. Fountain, Aiding and Abetting Involuntary Manslaughter and Negligent Homicide:

3308

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

An Unprincipled Extension of Principald Liability, Army Law. 3, 5 (Nov. 1991).

[FN149]. Especially those with complicity statutes that have language requiring that the accomplice have the intent to promote/facilitate the commission of the crime. See Echols v. State, 818 P.2d 691, 692 (Alaska Ct. App. 1991).

[FN150]. La. R.S. 14:12 (1997).

[FN151]. Fountain, supra note 148, at 9.

[FN152]. See supra note 151.

59 La. L. Rev. 325

END OF DOCUMENT

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. US Gov. Works.

I.C.L.Q. 2012, 61(2), 325-359

International & Comparative Law Quarterly

2012

Mental elements under article 30 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: a comparative analysis

Sarah Finnin

© 2012 Cambridge University Press

Subject: Criminal law. Other Related Subject: International law. Legal systems

Keywords: Australia; Comparative law; Criminal intent; Criminal liability; Germany; International criminal law; Recklessness; United States

Legislation cited: Statute of the International Criminal Court 1998 (United Nations) art.30

Cases cited: Prosecutor v Lubanga Dyilo (Thomas) (Decision on Confirmation of Charges) Unreported January 29, 2007 (ICC)
Prosecutor v Bemba Gombo (Jean-Pierre) (Decision on Confirmation of Charges) Unreported June 15, 2009 (ICC)

325 Abstract The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court is the first international instrument that includes a general provision on the mental element required before criminal responsibility for an international crime attaches (Article 30). This article analyses that provision from a comparative perspective, drawing on common law and civil law understandings of intent. It analyses the jurisprudence and commentary concerning Article 30 in detail, and attempts to draw some conclusions as to what aspects of the common law and civil law concepts of intent are covered by it.

I. INTRODUCTION

Prior to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Rome Statute),1 no international statute, code or charter included a general provision on the mental element required before criminal responsibility for an international crime would attach. The Nuremberg and Tokyo Charters,2 which governed the trials of the major German and Japanese war criminals following the Second World War, contained no such provision. Nor did Control Council Law No 10,3 which governed the subsequent trials of war criminals in post-war occupied Germany. The Statutes of the ad hoc International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) and for Rwanda (ICTR)4 did not contain such a provision, nor did the various Draft Codes of Crimes against the Peace 326 and Security of Mankind prepared by the United Nations International Law Commission.5 This omission was not repeated with the Rome Statute, which includes a specific provision (Article 30) on the mental element required for crimes within the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court (ICC). This makes Article 30 the first of its kind.

Article 30 of the Rome Statute provides that:

1. Unless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge.

2. For the purposes of this article, a person has intent where:

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

(a) In relation to conduct, that person means to engage in the conduct;

(b) In relation to a consequence, that person means to cause that consequence or is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.

3. For the purposes of this article, 'knowledge' means awareness that a circumstance exists or a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events. 'Know' and 'knowingly' shall be construed accordingly.

Thus, Article 30 represents an ambitious attempt at codification of the rules relating to the mental element in international criminal law. As Pisani states, it is 'designed to bring some consistency into this area of the law'.6 First, it aims to set a default rule that applies, in principle, to all crimes included in the Rome Statute. It therefore requires that, unless otherwise provided, the material elements of a crime be committed with 'intent and knowledge'. Second, it seeks to provide a comprehensive definition of these concepts of 'intent' and 'knowledge' in the two subsequent paragraphs.

While the mere presence of Article 30 in the Rome Statute is a step forward compared to previous international statutes, codes and charters that did not include any such provision, the article has been subject to criticism from all corners of academia. Cassese describes it as 'confusing and ambiguous',7 while Werle and Jessberger state that it 'raises more questions than answers'.8 Satzger describes it as 'an extremely complex rule' that is 'quite clearly a 327 compromise between continental and Anglo-American criminal law'.9 Eser, on the other hand, while recognizing that Article 30 'can certainly not be called a masterpiece of legal architecture', considers that 'it provides sufficient building blocks for a meaningful construction of "intention"'.10

This article analyses Article 30 of the Rome Statute from a comparative perspective, by drawing on the different approaches taken by two broad groupings of States: the common law grouping, and the civil law grouping. The primary systems drawn on as examples of the common law grouping are the United States, the United Kingdom and Australia,11 while that drawn on as an example of the civil law grouping is Germany.12 The article begins with a general introduction to the concept of intent, as it is understood in both civil law and common law domestic legal systems. This is necessary in order to understand the approach taken at Rome because, as Kelt and von Hebel explain, Article 30 'necessarily consisted of compromises between different concepts or norms from various legal systems'.13 Part III examines the provisions of Article 30 in detail, and attempts to draw some conclusions as to what aspects of the common law and civil law concepts of intent are covered by it. Part IV discusses the exceptions to Article 30, and the article concludes with some opinions on the appropriate direction of future jurisprudence and a possible amendment to the Rome Statute.

328 II. THE CONCEPT OF INTENT IN COMMON LAW AND CIVIL LAW

A. Gradations of Intent

In all domestic criminal law systems, the general rule (although it is not without exceptions) is that conduct must be committed with 'intent' in order for it to constitute a crime.14 Conduct that is unintentional, or that is committed negligently, will constitute a crime only in limited circumstances (usually, but not always, where specifically provided for by statute). While all systems require 'intent', the definition of intent varies widely depending on the particular domestic system in question. Furthermore, it is rare for a single definition of intent to be applied to every crime. Rather, domestic criminal law systems recognize different gradations or degrees of intent. The same goes for international criminal law. Each gradation or degree has two components: a cognitive component (the element of awareness) and a volitional component (the element of desire).15 What sets each gradation or degree of intent apart is the relative level of each component.

Generally speaking, common law systems recognize three gradations of intent: direct intent, oblique intent and recklessness. In addition, certain crimes can be committed negligently, or even unintentionally (eg strict or absolute liability offences). Civil law countries similarly recognize three gradations of intent: dolus directus in the first degree, dolus directus in the second degree and conditional intent (generally referred to as dolus eventualis). In addition, civil law countries recognize two forms of negligence (advertent and inadvertent). Furthermore, both common law and civil law systems recognize some form of special (or additional) intent for particular crimes.16

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

Table 1 represents my attempt to provide a visual comparison of the different gradations of intent recognized in the domestic criminal justice systems of common law and civil law countries, in descending order of culpability.17 Inevitably, it only gives a broad outline of these gradations, as there is no one 'common law' or 'civil law' approach to intent. In fact, approaches differ considerably among civil law countries (and, to a lesser extent, between common

Table 1. Gradations of intent under common law and civil law

Common law	Civil law
Special (additional) intent	Special (additional) intent (besondere Absicht or dolus specialis)
Direct intent	Direct intent in the first degree (Absicht or dolus directus in the first degree)
V = Very High C = Low %Y(45)27	V = Very High C = Low %W6D
Oblique intent	Direct intent in the second degree (direkter Vorsatz or dolus directus in the
V = Low C = High	second degree)
	V = Low C = Very High %W6D
%W6D	Conditional intent (bedingter Vorsatz or dolus eventualis)
Recklessness V = Low C = Low/Moderate	V = Low C = Moderate %W6D
	Advertent (conscious) negligence (bewusste Fahrlässigkeit)
%W6D (Inadvertent/unconscious) negligence V = None C = None	V = Low C = Low %W6D Inadvertent (unconscious) negligence V = None C = None

*329 law countries).18 While some countries recognize every gradation listed, others do not recognize them all.19 Similarly, while some countries define certain gradations in a particular way, other countries adopt very different definitions.20 Therefore, the borders between each gradation should not be viewed as clear *330 lines, but rather as boundaries that move, depending on the particular domestic legal system one is examining and the time at which it is examined.

In the same way, there is no one view on how the various gradations of intent recognized by common law and civil law systems line up when compared directly. Commentators disagree, for example, on whether recklessness (in common law) and dolus eventualis (in civil law) are really different, and in what way. Thus, the placement of certain common law gradations next to (or above or below) certain civil law gradations should not be viewed as definitive, but rather as a starting point for the following discussion. In fact, it is questionable whether it is even possible to compare the different gradations directly, as the concepts are so different. Instead of comparing concepts, it may therefore be more accurate to view the following table as comparing the likely outcomes; in other words, comparing whether an individual in a particular case would be considered to fulfil the definition of the relevant gradation if that same individual was to come before each domestic criminal justice system.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

Before examining Table 1, a few more explanations are required. First, in addition to the English terms for each of the civil law gradations of intent, I have provided both the German and Latin terms, which are more commonly used by commentators and courts. Second, beneath the name of each gradation, an indication has been given of the relative level of the volitional (V) and cognitive (C) components required for each. As will be seen, both the volitional and cognitive components are present for all gradations, except for (inadvertent) negligence.

B. Direct Intent (in the First Degree)

Putting aside the question of special or additional intent, the highest gradation or level of intent for both civil law and common law systems is characterized by the perpetrator's purposeful will to bring about the prohibited result. This gradation is captured by the following example:

P (the perpetrator) is a sniper who wishes to kill V (the victim). V is standing inside a building a significant distance away. P shoots in the direction of V when V passes in front of the window of the building. The bullet shatters the window, and hits V. V dies as a result of the gunshot wound.

In this example, P has a strong desire to kill V; thus, the volitional component is very high. He is not sure whether, by his conduct, he will succeed in killing V (that is, whether he can hit his target at such a distance), but this does not matter, as this gradation of intent is still satisfied even where the cognitive component is low.

This gradation is generally known in civil law systems as direct intent (or dolus directus) in the first degree. In German law, direct intent in the first degree (Absicht) requires that the perpetrator 'have the completion of the 331 offence (element) as his purpose'.21 The perpetrator will be deemed to have this level of intent 'also with regard to any fact that is a necessary or indispensable interim or ulterior consequence of his primary purpose' (eg shattering the window in the example above).22 As to the cognitive component, in German law it is not necessary that the perpetrator be certain that the prohibited result will occur (that is, it is not necessary that the perpetrator be certain that he will succeed in killing V).23

This gradation is known in some common law systems (eg the US) as acting 'purposely', while other common law countries (eg the UK and Australia) refer to it simply as acting 'intentionally'. To avoid confusion, I have adopted the more academic title for this gradation: direct intent. As to the content of this gradation in common law, the US Model Penal Code provides that a person acts 'purposely' when it is his or her 'conscious object' to engage in conduct or cause a result.24 Similarly, the Commonwealth Criminal Code in Australia provides that a person acts with 'intention' if he or she 'means to' engage in conduct or to bring about a result.25 Under English common law, this gradation covers cases where an individual acts 'in order to bring about a result'.26 As with the same gradation under civil law, where a person acts in order to achieve a particular purpose, knowing that this cannot be done without causing another result (eg shattering a window), he or she must be held to intend to cause that other result (whether it be a pre-condition for, or a necessary concomitant of, the first result).27

C. Oblique Intent, or Direct Intent in the Second Degree

The second gradation or level of intent for both civil law and common law systems does not require the same purposive degree as the first gradation. This gradation is captured by the following example:

P wishes to kill V by bombing the building in which V is located. P is aware that there are other individuals in the building, and that they will almost certainly be killed as well. While P does not want these other individuals to be killed (and in fact he hopes fervently that they will somehow escape death), he nevertheless bombs the building. Both V and a number of other individuals are killed in the blast.

332 In this case, P will be held to have fulfilled the second gradation or level of intent with respect to the deaths of the other individuals who were in the building with V. So, with this second gradation of intent, the volitional component is weaker (P did not wish to kill these other individuals); it is the cognitive component that dominates (P was almost certain that these individuals would die as a result of his conduct in bombing the building).

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

This gradation is generally known in civil law systems as direct intent (or dolus directus) in the second degree. In such cases, the perpetrator foresees as a certainty or as highly probable that certain consequences will flow from his or her conduct.28 As Van der Vyver explains, despite the perpetrator not having any desire for those consequences to occur, the perpetrator nevertheless engages in the conduct.29 According to Badar, he or she acts indifferently with regard to the consequences, and is therefore deemed to have desired those consequences.30 Similarly, the German Federal Supreme Court of Justice states that 'a perpetrator who foresees a consequence of his conduct as certain is considered to act will-fully with regard to this consequence, even if he regrets its occurrence'.31

This gradation is known in some common law systems (eg the US) as acting 'knowingly', although in others (eg the UK and Australia) it is still referred to as acting 'intentionally'.32 Again, I have adopted the more academic title of oblique intent in Table 1. The US Model Penal Code provides that a person acts 'knowingly' with respect to a result when he or she is 'practically certain' that his or her conduct will cause such a result.33 Similarly, under English common law, the concept of oblique intent covers cases where a consequence is 'virtually certain'.34 According to Williams, '[t]here are twin consequences of the act, x and y; the doer wants x, and is prepared to accept its unwanted twin y '.35 In other jurisdictions, the test is not as high. For example, in the Australian Commonwealth Criminal Code, a person acts with this type of intention with respect to a result where he or she 'is aware that it will occur in 333 the ordinary course of events'.36 This provision was based on37 clause 18(b)(ii) of the Draft Criminal Code Bill prepared by the English Law Commission.38 The Law Commission intended this phrase to cover cases where a result was 'a virtual certainty' (ie a result that would occur 'in the absence of some wholly improbable supervening event').39 It admitted in its report, however, that it was possible, under this definition, that 'juries will, in a few cases, find intention to be proved where, under the existing law [which required foresight of the virtual certainty of the result], they might not have done so'.40 For this reason, in Table 1 the 'oblique intent' category (in the common law column) extends lower than the 'direct intent in the second degree' category (in the civil law column). This is an attempt to demonstrate that depending on the jurisdiction (for example, in Australia), this category may capture more cases (on the lower end of the scale) than the equivalent civil law category. This is because the test for acting with oblique intent in a common law system may require only that the result occur in the ordinary course of events, whereas the test for acting with 'direct intent in the second degree' in a civil law system will require that a consequence be foreseen as a certainty or as highly probable. Nevertheless, in both common law and civil law systems, this gradation of intent is characterized by a low volitional component, and a high cognitive component.

D. Recklessness and Dolus Eventualis

In the third gradation or level of intent, the volitional component remains weak and the cognitive component still dominates; however, the cognitive component is weaker than in the second gradation. Let us consider a slightly modified version of the last example:

P wishes to kill V by bombing the building in which V is located. This building is in a busy street. P is aware that there is a risk that, in the explosion, other individuals may be injured or even killed. While P does not want these other individuals to be injured or killed, he nevertheless bombs the building. Both V and a number of other individuals are killed in the blast.

In this example, while P is not certain that other individuals will be killed in the blast, he is aware of a risk that this might occur. Thus, the cognitive component 334 is weaker than in the last example. Again, P does not wish to kill the other individuals, so the volitional component is low.

In civil law systems, this gradation is occupied by the concept of dolus eventualis or conditional intent. There is no one test or definition for dolus eventualis. Different tests or definitions have been put forward by commentators and adopted by courts at different times and in different jurisdictions.41 Broadly speaking, dolus eventualis exists where a person 'is aware that a material element included in the definition of a crime ... may result from his conduct and "reconciles himself" or "makes peace" with this fact'.42 As Bohlander explains, the major schools of thought generally agree that the perpetrator must have been aware of the fact that his or her actions might lead to particular consequences; the disagreement centres mainly on the volitional component.43 Some theories do not require any volitional component (but differ as to the required level of awareness of the possibility or probability of the result occurring), while others do require a volitional component (but differ as to whether this should constitute approval/mental consent to the result, or whether an attitude of indifference would suffice).44 According to Bohlander, the German courts have adopted a 'watered-down approval theory'.45 By this theory, a perpetrator will act with dolus eventualis where he or she foresees the consequences of his or her actions as possible (but not inevitable), and approves of them (in the sense that he or she has reconciled him- or herself to those consequences for the sake of achieving his or her goal).46 The approval of the perpetrator does not need to be explicit, and the perpetrator need not morally approve of the result; it is sufficient if he or she nevertheless accepts it in order to reach his or her ulterior goal.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

The broad equivalent of dolus eventualis in common law systems is recklessness. Essentially, recklessness is a form of 'conscious risk-taking',47 as it involves a person taking an unreasonable and unjustifiable risk, of which he or she is aware. Under the Australian Commonwealth Criminal Code (which is based on the US Model Penal Code),48 a person will be found to have acted 335 recklessly if that person was aware of a substantial risk that his or her conduct would cause a particular result, and, having regard to the circumstances known to him or her at the time, it was unjustifiable to take that risk.49 Under Australian common law, the test for recklessness is foresight of probability in cases of murder, and foresight of possibility for all other crimes. Recklessness is defined in the Code in terms of a 'substantial' risk rather than in terms of probability or possibility because those terms 'invite speculation about mathematical chances'.50 Regardless of the exact formulation, the cognitive element for recklessness is low. Unlike dolus eventualis, recklessness does not specifically require that a person reconcile him- or herself to, or accept the outcome of, his or her risk-taking. It simply requires a decision to take a substantial and unjustifiable risk.

Commentators disagree as to whether there is any real difference between the concepts of recklessness and dolus eventualis. Generally, those who believe there is a difference argue that dolus eventualis sets a 'higher threshold' than recklessness, because recklessness does not require as high a volitional component.51 This appears to be the position taken by the ICTY Trial Chamber in the Stakc case,52 as well as ICC Pre-Trial Chamber I in the 336 Lubanga case.53 However, while the test for recklessness does not explicitly require as high a volitional component as the test for dolus eventualis, because the individual does not have to be shown to have 'accepted' or 'been reconciled with' the outcome, the fact that the individual decides to proceed with the relevant conduct despite knowledge of the substantial risk is evidence of some level of volition.54 Whatever the differences may be between the two concepts, as Werle suggests, these gradations of the mental element would 'usually cover the same factual constellations'.55 Nevertheless, in recognition of the fact that recklessness does not specifically require that a person reconcile him- or herself or accept the outcome of his or her risk-taking, recklessness is given a lower volitional element than dolus eventualis in Table 1.

Having introduced the concept of intent in common law and civil law domestic criminal justice systems and identified the various gradations of intent recognized in those systems, the next part of this article turns to Article 30 of the Rome Statute, and attempts to situate the concepts covered by it in relation to the gradations of intent set out in Table 1.

III. ARTICLE 30 OF THE ROME STATUTE

A. Intent and Knowledge

Paragraph 1 of Article 30 sets out the general rule that the material elements of an international crime must be committed with intent and knowledge. However, prior to the February 1997 session of the Preparatory Committee for the Rome Conference, there was debate as to whether these two terms should be disjunctive ('or') or conjunctive ('and').56 Ultimately, a decision was made to use the conjunctive formulation. As both Pisani and Eser explain, it was felt that this formulation was necessary in order to emphasize, from a psychological-analytical point of view, the necessary coexistence of the cognitive and volitional components of intent, both of which can vary in different degrees for the different gradations (as depicted in Table 1 337 above).57 However, as is noted below, this does not mean that each particular material element must be committed with both 'intent' and 'knowledge', as those terms are defined in the subsequent two paragraphs of Article 30.

B. Element Analysis Approach

Unlike the statutes and codes that came before it, the Rome Statute takes an 'element analysis' approach, rather than a 'crime analysis' or 'offence analysis' approach.58 'Elements' are the basic 'building blocks' of a crime.59 The Rome Statute recognizes two types of element: material elements (also known variously in domestic systems as the actus reus, physical elements or objective elements) and mental elements (also known variously in domestic systems as the mens rea or subjective elements). The material elements represent the 'external side of criminal conduct', while the mental elements represent the 'internal side'.60 As Badar explains:

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

Under 'offence analysis', crimes are defined in general terms; intentional crimes, reckless crimes and negligent crimes, whereas 'element analysis' in contrast, recognizes that a single crime definition may require a different culpable state of mind for each objective element of the offence.61

The jurisprudence of previous military and international tribunals tended to take an offence analysis approach, and did not distinguish the various material elements of a crime and apply different mental elements to each. The ICC, however, is required by its Statute to analyse crimes in terms of their different types of material elements, which are each assigned a different mental element.

338 The Rome Statute contemplates three types of material element: conduct elements, consequence elements and circumstance elements;62 it does not define the terms 'conduct', 'consequence' or 'circumstance'.63 According to commentators:

• Conduct includes 'a prohibited action or prohibited omission that is described in the definition of a crime'.64 As Werle notes, 'every international crime presumes some conduct that is more precisely delineated in the definition of the crime'.65

• Consequences 'can refer either to a completed result, such as the causing of death, or the creation of a state of harm or risk of harm, such as endangerment, for example'.66

• Circumstances 'qualify the conduct and consequences. They may, for example, describe the requisite features of the persons or things mentioned in the conduct and consequence elements'.67 According to Heller, a circumstance element is 'an additional state of affairs that must exist for the prohibited conduct and consequence to be criminal' (which may be either factual or legal).68

Because the mental element is defined differently for different kinds of material elements, the classification of a material element as a conduct, consequence or circumstance element is critical: the relevant mental element cannot be determined until each material element of a crime is properly characterized.69 However, as a number of commentators have pointed out, the dividing line between these types of material elements is not always 339 clear.70 Robinson and Grall argue that most of these difficulties can be avoided if 'conduct' elements are defined literally, and thus narrowly, to mean pure conduct, that is, to mean the actual physical movement of the actor. Thus, objective elements of an offense definition that might otherwise be classified as conduct elements, but which actually describe characteristics of the conduct--i.e., elements concerning the 'nature of conduct'--should be treated as circumstances.71

In a way, this would involve breaking down what would normally be considered one element (eg transferring, directly or indirectly, parts of the population of an Occupying Power into occupied territory)72 into two or more separate elements (thus, in this example, transferring parts of a population into a territory as a conduct element, and the status of the territory as occupied territory and of the population as that of an Occupying Power as circumstance elements). According to this argument, whenever a phrase combines a conduct element with a circumstance element in the Rome Statute, the elements should be separated out.

Similarly, material elements that might otherwise be classified as conduct elements but that actually describe results following the conduct, should be treated as consequence elements. Again, this involves breaking down what would normally be considered one element (eg inflicting great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health, by means of an inhumane act)73 into two or more separate elements (in this example, committing the inhumane act as a conduct element, and the requisite effect of the act, such as great suffering, as a consequence element). Again, according to this argument, whenever a phrase combines a conduct element with a consequence element in the Rome Statute, the elements should be separated out.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

Robinson and Grall also note the fact that distinguishing circumstance elements from consequence elements can be difficult.74 To resolve such problems, they suggest defining a consequence as 'a circumstance changed by the actor'.75 All elements that do not fit this definition would be 'independent circumstance elements'.76 Let us take the example of the war crime of starvation as a method of warfare, and the particular element of that crime of 'depriving civilians of objects indispensable to their survival': the actor creates the deprivation (a consequence element), but he or she cannot alter the status 340 of the objects as indispensable to the survival of the civilians (a circumstance element).77

In conclusion, Robinson and Grall's suggestions create the following situation:

> In every offense, the conduct element, although perhaps linguistically merged with other elements, would simply perform the function of the act requirement. [Consequence] elements would be easy to detect; they would be circumstances changed by the actor. All other elements would be circumstance elements.78

Once a material element has been properly characterized as a conduct, consequence or circumstance element, paragraphs (2) and (3) of Article 30 provide the applicable definition of the mental element. For a conduct element, only intent is required, as knowledge is not defined with respect to conduct. Similarly, for a circumstance element, only knowledge is required, because intent is not defined with respect to circumstances. For a consequence element, however, both intent and knowledge must be proven, because Article 30 defines both those terms with respect to consequence elements. The definitions of 'intent' and 'knowledge' provided in Article 30, as they apply to the three different material elements, are set out in Table 2.79

Therefore, depending on whether a particular element is a conduct, consequence or circumstance element, the required mental element will be either intent or knowledge or both. This position is supported by the Elements of Crimes, which states that > where no reference is made in the Elements of Crimes to a mental element for any particular conduct, consequence or circumstance listed, it is understood that the relevant mental element, for example, intent, knowledge or both, set out in article 30 applies.80

For this reason, although Article 30(1) provides that a person shall be criminally responsible only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge, as Werle and Jessberger explain, this part of the article 'cannot be interpreted as requiring that all material elements have to be committed with intent and knowledge'.81

Nevertheless, as all crimes under the jurisdiction of the ICC involve conduct and at least one other type of material element (whether it be a consequence element or a circumstance element), when the various elements of the crime are combined, one will end up with proof of both intent and knowledge.82

Table 2. Definitions of 'intent' and 'knowledge' in Article 30

	Intent	Knowledge
Conduct	means to engage in the conduct: Article 30(2)(a)	None
Consequence	means to cause the consequence OR aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events: Article 30(2)(b)	aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events: Article 30(3)
Circumstance	None	aware it exists: Article 30(3)

341 C. Definitions of 'Intent'

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

Article 30(2) defines two different levels or gradations of 'intent'. A person has 'intent' with respect to conduct or a consequence if he or she 'means to' engage in the conduct (Article 30(2)(a)) or cause the consequence (Article 30(2)(b) (first alternative)). A person also has 'intent' with respect to a consequence if he or she 'is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events' (Article 30(2)(b)(second alternative)).

1. 'Means to'

The first level or gradation of intent ('means to' engage in conduct or cause a consequence) is defined using language identical to the wording found in the Australian Commonwealth Criminal Code, which was based on the English Draft Criminal Code Bill. In those Codes, this language was used to codify the concept of 'direct intent'. I submit, therefore, that this language covers what is known in the common law as direct intent, and what is known in civil law countries as dolus directus in the first degree (that is, the highest gradation or level of intent).83 In my view, it should therefore be interpreted as covering cases characterized by the accused's purposeful will to engage in the conduct or bring about the prohibited consequence (ie where the volitional component is very high). In the language of the US Model Penal Code, engaging in the conduct or causing the result should be the perpetrator's 'conscious object'. This interpretation of the language 'means to' is supported by the jurisprudence of Pre-Trial Chambers I and II of the ICC, which have held that this language requires that the accused act with the 'concrete intent',84 'purposeful will'85 or 'express intent'86 to bring about the material elements of the crime. 342 As is the case for this level or gradation of intent in domestic law, the perpetrator should also be taken to have this level of intent with regard to any fact that is a necessary or indispensable interim or ulterior consequence of his or her primary purpose (such as shattering the window in the example given above).

There will, in my view, be one significant difference between the 'means to' concept in Article 30 and the concept of direct intent or dolus directus in the first degree in common law and civil law systems respectively. That difference relates to the required cognitive component. In common law and civil law systems, the law relating to this gradation of intent generally does not require anything more than a low cognitive component to accompany the very high volitional component. Thus, it is not required that the perpetrator be certain that he or she will succeed in engaging in the conduct, or in bringing about the prohibited result. In fact, it would be sufficient for the perpetrator to believe that it is very unlikely that he or she will succeed. Take, for example, the case of an individual who shoots at a target that is some distance away. In this case, the perpetrator believes it unlikely that he or she will successfully kill the victim at such a great distance, but, if he or she succeeds, he or she will be considered to have fulfilled this gradation of intent, so long as it was his or her conscious object to kill the victim.

Under Article 30, however, for a person to be held criminally responsible for a crime, the material elements must be committed with intent and knowledge. From the discussion above, we know that both intent and knowledge will only be required in relation to a consequence element, because this is the only element for which 'intent' and 'knowledge' are defined.87 Therefore, with respect to a consequence element, it must be proven not only that the perpetrator 'meant to' cause a consequence, but that he or she also fulfilled the definition of 'knowledge' (that is, that he or she was aware that the consequence would occur in the ordinary course of events). Therefore, while only a low cognitive component is necessarily required by the definition of intent, the cognitive component for a consequence element is raised by the requirement that consequence elements be committed with knowledge. The effect of this is that whereas a perpetrator need not be certain that he or she will succeed in engaging in conduct (because there is no knowledge requirement for a conduct element), a perpetrator must be aware that he or she will succeed in bringing about a consequence 'in the ordinary course of events'. Therefore, this gradation of mental element in Article 30 of the Rome Statute is much more difficult to fulfil than the equivalent gradation in common law and civil law systems.

This position regarding the necessary cognitive component when applied to a consequence element is supported by ICC Pre-Trial Chamber I's decision in Lubanga, where the Chamber noted that Article 30 covered 'first and 343 foremost' the concept of 'dolus directus of the first degree'. It defined this concept as covering situations where the perpetrator:

... (i) knows that his or her actions or omissions will bring about the objective elements of the crime, and (ii) undertakes such actions or omissions with the concrete intent to bring about the objective elements of the crime ...88

Thus, the Chamber viewed this gradation of intent as requiring that the perpetrator 'know' that his or her conduct would bring about a certain consequence (a very high cognitive component).

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

In conclusion, while at first it might appear that the language 'means to' in Article 30(2)(a) and (b)(first alternative) incorporates the concept of direct intent or dolus directus in the first degree (as those concepts are defined in domestic law), the requirement that consequence elements also be committed with 'knowledge' means that this gradation in Article 30 is in fact much higher than its equivalent in domestic law. Unlike in domestic law, where this gradation is normally characterized by a very high volitional component and only a low cognitive component, under Article 30 the gradation is characterized by very high volitional and cognitive components (when it is applied to consequences).

To give an example of the practical impact this may have, consider the case of an accused who plants an improvised explosive device (or 'IED', which have a notoriously low success rate), which he or she intends to initiate remotely when civilians come within range. It is the perpetrator's conscious object to kill those civilians; however, unless it could be shown that he or she knew (at the time the device was initiated) that the device would explode successfully and thereby result in the death of those civilians, the perpetrator would not satisfy this gradation of intent. Regardless of how much he or she might desire to kill those civilians, and how much he or she might hope that the IED will initiate properly, this would not be sufficient if it could not also be shown that he or she had the required knowledge. This obviously represents an unexpected and undesired consequence of the conjunctive 'intent and knowledge' wording of Article 30.

2. 'Aware it will occur in the ordinary course of events'

The second level or gradation of intent defined in Article 30(2) exists where a person 'is aware that [a consequence] will occur in the ordinary course of events' (Article 30(2)(b)(second alternative)). As with the first level, this language is identical to the wording used in the Australian Commonwealth Criminal Code and the English Draft Criminal Code Bill. In those Codes, it was used to codify the concept of oblique intent. I submit, therefore, that this language broadly covers what is known in the common law as oblique intent, 344 and what is known in civil law countries as dolus directus in the second degree.89 In such cases, the perpetrator foresees as practically certain or as highly probable that certain consequences will flow from his or conduct. While the perpetrator does not have any desire for these consequences to occur, he or she nevertheless engages in the conduct, and is therefore deemed to have desired them. This gradation does not require the same purposive degree as the first gradation defined in Article 30 (that is, it does not require the same high volitional component), but the cognitive component is high (that is, the perpetrator must see the relevant consequence as virtually certain or highly probable).90 Therefore, as with the interpretation of the phrase 'in the ordinary course of events' under the English Draft Criminal Code Bill, I submit that this phrase in Article 30 should be interpreted to mean that the result would occur *in the absence of some wholly improbable supervening event.*91 This is also the position taken by Werle and Jessberger and by Badar, who interpret the language to mean that the consequence would occur 'unless extraordinary circumstances intervened'.92

It is relatively clear that the language of Article 30(2)(b)(second alternative) covers the concept of oblique intent or dolus directus in the second degree. This has been confirmed by the jurisprudence of the Court to date. For example, in Bemba, ICC Pre-Trial Chamber II described this gradation as requiring that the accused be 'aware that [the material] elements will be the almost inevitable outcome of his acts or omissions'.93 The more important question, however, is whether such language includes anything lower than this. In other words, do the words 'will occur in the ordinary course of events' also cover cases that would fall within the categories of dolus eventualis or recklessness, as they are understood in their respective domestic criminal law systems?

Provisions giving definitions of dolus eventualis and recklessness were present early on in the negotiations of a draft statute prior to Rome. According to Badar, the notion of dolus eventualis 'was last discussed in the 1996 Report of the Preparatory Committee and since then had vanished from all the subsequent reports and Statute drafts',94 whereas, as Clark explains, the provision on recklessness 'was ultimately to vanish also from the Statute at 345 Rome'.95 In both cases, there was no formal decision to drop the relevant provisions,96 leading commentators to speculate now with respect to the intentions of the drafters. For example, Clark explains that his understanding of the terms of the debate among States at the Rome Conference 'was that most of the players ... were generally uncomfortable with liability based on recklessness or its civil law (near) counterpart dolus eventualis '.97 Pisani argues that, while a formulation that clearly included dolus eventualis did not appear in the final formulation of Article 30, 'this consideration on its own would not constitute an obstacle to the application of international criminal responsibility based on [dolus] eventualis '.98 She concludes, however, that:

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

[t]he extensive debate amongst the various points of view as well as the preparatory drafts and the definitive choice adopted by the Statute to exclude recklessness as a form of responsibility are all unequivocal indications that those who drafted the Statute wanted to limit the subjective element to ... direct intent ... [and] oblique intent ... It seems clear, then, that the word 'intent' must be interpreted as excluding recklessness as well as ... *dolus eventualis.*99

Werle and Jessberger argue that 'the fact that a definition of recklessness provided for in the Draft Statute was removed during the negotiations at Rome does not militate against including recklessness as a basis for criminal responsibility under the ICC Statute'.100 Other authors, such as Ambos, have interpreted this deletion as meaning exactly that.101

It is possible that a provision defining dolus eventualis was dropped early on because drafters viewed it as being already covered by the terms of Article 30. On the other hand, it is arguable that the fact that the provision defining recklessness was retained up until Rome suggests that this concept was not already covered by the terms of Article 30 (that is, the definitions of 'intent' and 'knowledge' contained therein); in other words, if the wording 'will occur in the ordinary course of events' left room for such a concept, there would have been no need for a separate provision defining it.

346 With the drafting history providing little help, the dispute over whether recklessness and dolus eventualis are included within the meaning of Article 30 comes down to differing interpretations of the specific wording of that provision. With respect to recklessness, academics generally agree that this concept is not covered by Article 30, because it does not have the necessary volitional component required by the conjunctive use of 'intent and knowledge' in Article 30(1).102 This was also the position adopted by ICC Pre-Trial Chamber I in the Lubanga case.103 As the Chamber explained:

The concept of recklessness requires only that the perpetrator be aware of the existence of a risk that the objective elements of the crime may result from his or her actions or omissions, but does not require that he or she reconcile himself or herself with the result. In so far as recklessness does not require the suspect to reconcile himself or herself with the causation of the objective elements of the crime as a result of his or her actions or omissions, it is not part of the concept of intention.104

Thus, recklessness, which the Court regards as having a lower volitional component than dolus eventualis, is not, in the view of Pre-Trial Chamber I, covered by the terms of Article 30. Pre-Trial Chamber II also took the view in Bemba that recklessness is not captured by Article 30 of the Statute.105

As for the concept of dolus eventualis, the dispute comes down to the interpretation of the wording 'will occur'. On the one side, there are those who argue that such wording cannot be interpreted to include dolus eventualis. They argue that mere probability that a consequence may occur is insufficient, and that the wording requires that the perpetrator foresee the occurrence of the consequence as certain. For example, according to Werle and Jessberger, dolus eventualis is excluded by the wording 'will occur'; in their view, dolus eventualis (which requires only a risk that a consequence may occur, rather than a practical certainty) would only be covered if the language were 'may occur'.106 This is also the view taken by Eser,107 Ambos,108 Heller109 and van Sliedregt.110

347 On the other side, those in favour of the inclusion of dolus eventualis argue that this phrase requires only that the perpetrator be aware of the probable occurrence of the consequence. However, as Werle and Jessberger note, '[r]emarkably, the few commentators who advocate the inclusion of ... dolus eventualis ... hardly ever give any reasons for their position'.111 Examples include Jescheck,112 Mantovani,113 Knoops,114 Triffterer115 and Cassese.116 One exception is Piragoff and Robinson, who argue that if the concept of dolus eventualis is defined in terms of a substantial or high degree of probability (as opposed to merely a risk) that the consequence will occur, then it is covered by the terms of Article 30(2)(b)(second alternative); only those definitions of dolus eventualis that require merely a risk that a consequence will occur would be excluded.117 Ambos seems to agree with Piragoff and Robinson, stating that 'there are other, more cognitive concepts of dolus eventualis (requiring awareness or certainty as to a consequence) and these may indeed be included in Article 30'.118

Some of those commentators who argue against inclusion of dolus eventualis in Article 30(2)(b)(second alternative) have recognized that it would be possible for the ICC to interpret the phrase 'in the ordinary course of events' in a way that would include recklessness or dolus eventualis, but consider that such an interpretation may well conflict with the principle of strict construction.119 Indeed, this is exactly what has occurred: Pre-Trial Chamber I, in the first substantive decision of a Chamber of the ICC to interpret Article 30, found that the wording 'will occur in the ordinary course of events'

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

does include the concept of dolus eventualis. It stated that the concept of intention in Article 30 covers situations in which the suspect (a) is aware of the risk that the objective elements of the crime may result from his or her actions or omissions, and (b) accepts such an outcome by reconciling himself or herself with it or consenting to it (also known as dolus eventualis).120

348 The Chamber went on to state:

if the risk of bringing about the objective elements of the crime is substantial (that is, there is a likelihood that it 'will occur in the ordinary course of events'), the fact that the suspect accepts the idea of bringing about the objective elements of the crime can be inferred from:

i. the awareness by the suspect of the substantial likelihood that his or her actions or omissions would result in the realization of the objective elements of the crime; and

ii. the decision by the suspect to carry out his or her actions or omissions despite such awareness.

... Where the state of mind of the suspect falls short of accepting that the objective elements of the crime may result from his or her actions or omissions, such a state of mind cannot qualify as a truly intentional realization of the objective elements, and hence would not meet the 'intent and knowledge' requirement embodied in article 30 of the Statute.121

Thus, it appears that Pre-Trial Chamber I viewed the definition of intent with respect to consequences (ie that a consequence 'will occur in the ordinary course of events') as being fulfilled where: (a) there is a 'substantial' risk that the consequence will occur; and (b) the accused is shown to have been aware of this risk, and to have proceeded with the conduct regardless. While the Chamber was devoted to the idea that a volitional element must be shown in the form of acceptance of the outcome, however, this definition does not appear all that different from the definition of recklessness. In reality, therefore, there may not be any difference in terms of outcome. In Weigend's view, whether or not Pre-Trial Chamber I is correct in its interpretation of the wording of Article 30(2)(b), 'the Court's more expansive interpretation of that clause certainly makes theoretical and political sense'.122 While he does not explain what he means by this, it is likely that he is referring to the fact that both domestic legislation implementing provisions of the Rome Statute and the jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR have recognized liability for international crimes in cases where the perpetrator has only recklessness or *dolus eventualis.*123

More recently, in the Bemba case, ICC Pre-Trial Chamber II took the opposite position to Pre-Trial Chamber I regarding dolus eventualis, holding that the concept is not captured by Article 30.124 The Chamber made this 349 finding on the basis that the wording 'will occur' 'does not accommodate a lower standard than the one required by dolus directus in the second degree (oblique intention)'.125 Pre-Trial Chamber II stated further:

by way of a literal (textual) interpretation, the words '[a consequence] will occur' serve as an expression for an event that is 'inevitably' expected. Nonetheless, the words 'will occur', read together with the phrase 'in the ordinary course of events', clearly indicate that the required standard of occurrence is close to certainty. In this regard, the Chamber defines this standard as 'virtual certainty' or 'practical certainty', namely that the consequence will follow, barring an unforeseen or unexpected intervention that prevent[s] its occurrence.

This standard is undoubtedly higher than the principal standard commonly agreed upon for dolus eventualis --namely, foreseeing the occurrence of the undesired consequences as a mere likelihood or possibility. Hence, had the drafters of the Statute intended to include dolus eventualis in the text of article 30, they could have used the words 'may occur' or 'might occur in the ordinary course of events' to convey mere eventuality or possibility, rather than near inevitability or virtual certainty.126

Pre-Trial Chamber II found that this interpretation was supported by the travaux préparatoires of the Statute, which suggested that 'the idea of including dolus eventualis was abandoned at an early stage of the negotiations' of the Statute.127

No decision has yet been made by the Appeals Chamber of the ICC to resolve the contradictory conclusions reached by

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

Pre-Trial Chambers I and II with regard to dolus eventualis. Thus, it remains unclear whether this concept is covered by Article 30. In my view, however, the detailed analysis conducted by Pre-Trial Chamber II of the language and travaux préparatoires of the Statute lends greater weight to its finding that dolus eventualis is not covered by the language of Article 30. Furthermore, as a matter of policy, given the ICC's nature as a court of last resort and the principle of strict construction, an interpretation of Article 30 that does not include dolus eventualis is appropriate.

D. Definitions of 'Knowledge'

Article 30(3) provides two definitions of 'knowledge'. A person has 'knowledge' with respect to a circumstance if he or she has 'awareness that [it] exists', while a person has 'knowledge' with respect to a consequence if he or she has 'awareness that ... [it] will occur in the ordinary course of events'.

350 1. 'Awareness that a circumstance exists'

The first definition ('awareness that a circumstance exists') appears to require positive or actual knowledge of the relevant circumstance. The question is whether this requirement could be satisfied by proof of 'wilful blindness', as it is understood under the common law.128 In other words, would it be sufficient to prove that an accused suspected that a circumstance existed, but avoided actual knowledge by deliberately shutting his or her eyes to an obvious means of knowledge.129

Piragoff and Robinson recognize that the specific definition in Article 30(3) may exclude such a concept and that actual awareness or cognizance may be required. They also recognize, however, that 'it may be open to the Court to interpret "awareness" to include wilful blindness in some situations'.130 Eser seems to have come to the same conclusion, submitting that while a draft clause covering wilful blindness had been considered prior to Rome but was ultimately abandoned,131 this does not necessarily mean that the language of Article 30 could not be interpreted to cover cases of 'implied' or 'constructive' knowledge.132 Badar argues, on the other hand, that the wording of Article 30(3) 'limits the meaning of knowledge to "actual knowledge" as opposed to "constructive" knowledge'.133 He states that '[e]ven knowledge of "high probability" of the existence of a particular fact" is insufficient.134 He therefore concludes that the doctrine of 'wilful blindness' would only be covered by Article 30 'if the doctrine is understood to apply only in situations where the perpetrator is virtually certain that the fact exists'.135 Thus, in his view, Article 30 could be argued to cover cases where the accused realized the high probability that the circumstance existed, but purposely refrained from obtaining the final confirmation because he or she wanted to be able to deny knowledge.136

In my view, in the context of international crimes, where criminal conduct is widespread and ongoing, actual knowledge will be extremely difficult to prove if some concept of wilful blindness is not permitted as a method of proof. For 351 this reason, Article 30(3) should be interpreted as allowing proof by at least a limited form of wilful blindness, as put forward by Badar. As such, proof that an accused was virtually certain that a circumstance existed should be taken to satisfy the definition of knowledge in that provision.

2. 'Awareness that ... a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events'

The second definition of knowledge is formulated in exactly the same terms as the second gradation of intent defined in Article 30(2)(b)(second alternative). The issue of whether dolus eventualis is covered by this wording therefore applies equally to this definition of knowledge.

Having examined the default rule in Article 30 and the meaning of the terms intent and knowledge, the final substantive part of this article considers exceptions to that default rule.

IV. EXCEPTIONS TO ARTICLE 30 OF THE ROME STATUTE

A. Interpretation of 'Unless otherwise provided ...'

As indicated by the phrase '[u]nless otherwise provided' in Article 30(1), there are exceptions to the rule that the material elements of all crimes must be accompanied by knowledge and intent. Article 30 merely sets out a general or default rule that applies unless another rule provides for a departure from the general rule by requiring a different mental element.137

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

The issue of what sources of law may provide for a deviation from Article 30 in accordance with paragraph (1) was not settled at the Rome Conference, and commentators also hold differing opinions. Some argue that only provisions of the Rome Statute can provide an alternative mental element to that required by Article 30. For example, Weigend submits that the principle of legality means that 'expansions of the definition of the mental element in art. 30 of the ICC statute would have to be found in the statute itself, not in outside sources'.138 Eser is more specific: he argues that a deviation from Article 30 'may be found elsewhere in the Statute, for instance within the specific definition of crimes or general principles of criminal law'.139 Ambos goes further, however, arguing that 'deviations from Art. 30 can only arise directly from Art. 6-8' (the provisions which set out the crimes within the ICC's jurisdiction).140 This view is untenable, because Article 28, which relates to superior responsibility, is 352 clearly a provision within the Statute that provides an alternative (and less strict) mental element. Schabas argues that '[i]t would seem to be going too far to suggest that the Article 30 standard in the Statute could be amended if an exception is provided for in the Elements of Crimes', although he notes that this is exactly what they have done.141 Similarly, Kreß has stated his opinion that the Elements of Crimes cannot 'by themselves "provide otherwise"'.142

Others argue that the terms of Article 30(1) may encompass rules arising from the Elements of Crimes and other sources of international law under Article 21 of the Statute.143 According to Article 21(1) (which sets out the applicable law that governs the Court), the Court shall apply, in the first place, the Statute and the Elements of Crimes. In the second place, it may apply, 'where appropriate', applicable treaties and rules of customary international law. A final subsidiary source of law is 'general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world'.

The argument that sources outside the Statute may 'otherwise provide' for a mental element is based on a literal interpretation of the language of Article 30. As this argument goes, the wording of Article 30(1) does not specify that the default rule requiring intent and knowledge applies 'unless otherwise provided for in this Statute'; rather, a comparison of that wording with other wording in the Statute suggests, according to Werle and Jessberger, 'that the range of norms referred to in this case is much wider':144

When other provisions in the Statute itself are referenced, the reference is generally made explicit; thus, a comparable clause in Article 31(1) ICCSt. on the grounds for exclusion from punishment explicitly refers to 'other grounds for excluding criminal responsibility provided for in this Statute '.145

While Werle and Jessberger recognize the argument that the principle of legality requires that any expansion of the definition of the mental element in Article 30 'would have to be found in the Statute itself and not in outside sources', they view the 'uniform interpretation and application of the ICC 353 Statute and customary international law' as a more important objective in the context of international criminal law.146

Debate on this issue continued at the negotiations by the Preparatory Commission of the Elements of Crimes.147 As Piragoff and Robinson explain:

Some delegations were of the view that the Elements could not call for a deviation from article 30, as the Elements document is subsidiary to the Statute. Other delegations, while conceding that the Elements could not override the Statute, argued that some deviations were necessary to make the crimes workable and to faithfully reflect the intent of the Statute as well as the jurisprudence.148

The latter view was eventually accepted, and the General Introduction to the Elements of Crimes indicates that any exceptions to the standard of Article 30 that are found in the Elements of Crimes are based 'on the Statute, including applicable law under its relevant provisions' .149 Piragoff and Robinson further state that:

This formulation recognizes the primacy of the Statute, and indicates that exceptions must directly or indirectly flow from the Statute, but also recognizes that the Statute itself, through article 21 (applicable law), allows reliance on other sources, including treaties, general principles and the Elements. Thus, the approach seems to avoid suggesting that States Parties could legislate a deviation through the Elements, but allows them to codify a deviation where necessary to reflect their intent when drafting the Statute or to reflect the relevant treaties and jurisprudence.150

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

This position is consistent with rules of interpretation applicable to treaties, whereby a subsequent agreement among all treaty parties (eg the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute) concerning the application or interpretation of a treaty (in this case, the Statute) may be taken into account in interpreting the treaty (ie may be taken into account by the Court itself when it interprets its Statute).151

While the ICC Pre-Trial Chambers have thus far accepted that the Elements of Crimes can provide for a deviation from the Article 30 standard,152 it 354 remains unclear whether, in the absence of a clear indication in the Elements of Crimes, the Court can have reference to sources of law outside the Statute to found a deviation from that standard. For example, when determining what mental element is applicable to the modes of liability set out in Article 25(3) of the Statute (the elements of which were not elaborated in the Elements of Crimes), could the Court rely on customary international law to found a deviation from the Article 30 standard?

The argument put forward by Werle and Jessberger--that uniform interpretation and application of the Rome Statute and customary international law is a more important objective than strict adherence to the principle of legality--is compelling.153 While it is desirable to have clarity and precision in codification in order to give fair notice of the scope of prohibitions, it is perhaps more desirable for the law that is to be applied by a newly established and permanent international criminal court to be consistent with customary international law, as has been developed over a significant period of time prior to its establishment. Therefore, in my view, Article 30(1) should be interpreted to allow the Court to balance the potentially competing aims of the principle of legality and consistency with customary international law, by allowing the Court to have recourse to sources outside the Statute when determining the applicable mental element in a particular case, where the Elements of Crimes are silent (or where there are no Elements of Crimes, as in the case of modes of liability under Article 25 of the Statute).

B. Types of Exceptions to Article 30

Determining whether the language of a provision establishes an exception to the general rule set out in Article 30 must be done on a case-by-case basis.154 According to both Eser and to Werle and Jessberger, provisions that 'otherwise provide' for a mental element can do one of three things:

(i) impose a mental element that is less stringent than that provided for in Article 30;

(ii) impose a mental element that is more stringent than that provided for in Article 30; or

(iii) impose a mental element in addition to that provided for in Article 30 (ie a special or additional mental element).

Examples from the first category broaden or expand criminal responsibility, by requiring anything from recklessness or dolus eventualis to negligence.155 The second and third categories narrow criminal responsibility.

355 1. Less stringent mental elements

In addition to examples of the Statute itself providing for a less stringent mental element than that imposed by Article 30,156 there are various examples of the Elements of Crimes providing for a less stringent mental element with respect to one of the crimes it considers.157 These less stringent mental elements were imposed because, in the view of the Preparatory Commission that drafted the Elements of Crimes (and the Assembly of States Parties that adopted them), a less stringent mental element was justified in those cases (perhaps on the basis of a rule under some other 'applicable law'). It will be up to the Court to decide whether it agrees with this assessment, and whether it will therefore uphold the imposition of a less stringent mental element than that required by Article 30.158

2. More stringent mental elements

It is not entirely clear what the difference is between the second and third categories of provisions that 'otherwise provide' for a mental element (ie the category that imposes a mental element that is more stringent than that provided for in Article 30, and the category that imposes a special or additional mental element). In fact, Eser cites some of the same

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

examples (eg aiding and abetting) for both categories,159 and Werle and Jessberger do not provide any example of the category of more stringent mental requirements.160 It is perhaps for this reason that Piragoff and Robinson recognize only two categories (the first (less stringent mental elements) and the third (special or additional mental elements).161

In my view, because Article 30 incorporates what is understood to be the highest gradation of mental element in both common law and civil law systems (direct intent or dolus directus in the first degree), there is simply no room for other provisions to impose a more stringent mental element. There is, of course, room to impose additional mental elements (as is the case with genocide). However, in order to impose a more stringent mental element, the only possibility would be to require, for example, that the accused 'meant to' cause a consequence (thereby removing the lesser alternative included in 356 Article 30(2)(b) of being aware that a consequence 'will occur in the ordinary course of events'). There are no such examples of a more stringent mental element in the Statute or the Elements of Crimes.

3. Additional mental elements

As Piragoff and Robinson explain, an additional mental element exists where the Statute states that conduct must be committed for an ulterior purpose, or in pursuance of a specific goal (ie 'with intent to', 'with the intention of' or 'for the purpose of' achieving certain ends).162 This special intent, they state, is an element that must be proved in addition to any intent imposed by Article 30: 'It is a separate mental element that is not linked to any material element that must be proved or to which ... article 30 would apply'.163 Similarly, Werle and Jessberger view an additional mental element as one that does 'not necessarily refer to a material element of the crime, such as conduct, consequence or circumstance'.164 This may be where the difference lies between this category and the second category discussed above: where a more stringent mental element is required with respect to a particular material element, such a case would fall within category (ii) above;165 where an additional mental element is required that is not linked to any material element, such a case would fall within category (iii) above.

The fact that an additional mental element is not linked to any material element means that the accomplishment of the consequence that is the focus of that additional mental element--because the additional mental element is almost always directed at a particular consequence, rather than a circumstance or conduct--does not have to be proven.166 According to Triffterer, it does not even have to be proven that the particular consequence could ever be achieved.167

Examples of additional mental elements that are commonly cited are: the intent to inflict pain or suffering for such purposes as 'obtaining information or a confession, punishment, intimidation or coercion or for any reason based on 357 discrimination of any kind' for the war crime of torture under Article 8(2)(c)(i);168 the intent to maintain the 'institutionalized regime of systematic oppression and domination by one racial group over any other racial group or groups' for the crime against humanity of apartheid under Article 7(1)(j); the intent to destroy 'in whole or in part, [a] national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such' for the crime of genocide under Article 6;169 the intent to discriminate on 'political, racial, national, ethnic, cultural, religious, gender ... or other grounds' for the crime of persecution under Article 7(1)(h);170 the intent to 'deprive the owner of the property and to appropriate it for private or personal use' for the war crime of pillaging under Article 8(2)(b)(xvi) or 8(2)(e)(v);171 and the intent to 'facilitat[e] the commission of ... a crime' for the purposes of aiding and abetting under Article 25(3)(c).

One interesting question is whether the definitions of 'intent' and 'knowledge' contained in Article 30 apply to additional mental elements, or whether a higher or lower gradation of intent or definition of knowledge might apply. As an additional mental element is, by definition, a mental element that has no corresponding material element, it would appear that Article 30 does not apply, as Article 30's definitions of 'intent' and 'knowledge' are required only with respect to the material elements of a crime. If it is accepted that Article 30 does not regulate the mental element with respect to additional mental elements (that is, that there is a gap in the Statute), then the Court would be permitted to turn to other sources of law to provide the necessary contents of those mental elements. For example, the Court would be permitted to turn to customary international law (and the rich jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR before which that law has developed) in order to determine the meaning of the 'intent to destroy' requirement for genocide. Thus, it would be possible for the Court to adopt a different gradation of intent (ie one that includes the concept of dolus eventualis) or a different definition of knowledge (ie one that includes a more expansive concept of wilful blindness) for the purposes of such additional mental elements, if there is a basis to do so in another source of law to which the Court can have reference under Article 21.172

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

358 V. CONCLUSION

This article has demonstrated that some of the criticisms of Article 30 made by academics may be well founded. Article 30 does establish an extremely complex rule,173 requiring that material elements be classified as conduct, consequence or circumstance elements, and then requiring that a different definition of 'intent' or 'knowledge' or both be applied to each. Certain aspects of Article 30 are indeed confusing and ambiguous.174 For example, the lack of any definition of the terms 'conduct', 'consequence' and 'circumstance' (given the critical importance of accurately classifying material elements in order to determine what definition of 'intention' or 'knowledge' applies) is a clear failure on the part of the drafters of the Statute. Furthermore, the provision's attempt to define the concept of intent in Article 30(2)(a) is not entirely satisfactory, as the requirement that consequence elements be committed with intent and knowledge means that the gradation of mental element established under this sub-paragraph is higher than that of direct intent or dolus directus in the first degree under common law and civil law systems respectively. As noted above, this obviously represents an unexpected and undesired consequence of the conjunctive 'intent and knowledge' wording of Article 30. Moreover, the use of the phrase 'will occur in the ordinary course of events' in Article 30(2)(b) and (3) clearly 'raises more questions than answers',175 as it has led to conflicting opinions among both academics and the different Pre-Trial Chambers of the Court with respect to dolus eventualis. Finally, the definition of knowledge with respect to a circumstance in Article 30(3) appears to set too high a standard.

Nevertheless, I agree with Eser that Article 30 'provides sufficient building blocks for a meaningful construction of "intention"'.176 Some creative jurisprudence from the Chambers of the Court (in particular, from the Appeals Chamber on the issue of dolus eventualis) would go a significant way towards addressing these failures of drafting. In my view, the Court should:

1. Adopt definitions of the different types of material elements along the lines of those suggested by Robinson and Grall. Thus, conduct elements would be defined literally and narrowly to mean pure conduct; consequence elements would be defined as circumstances changed by the actor; all elements that do not fit these definitions would be independent circumstance elements.

2. Clearly exclude dolus eventualis from the definition of intent under Article 30(2)(b) and (3), along the lines of the decision in Bemba.

359 3. Allow for knowledge of a circumstance to be satisfied by proof of 'wilful blindness' (that is, by proof that the accused was virtually certain that a circumstance existed, but avoided actual knowledge by deliberately shutting his or her eyes to an obvious means of knowledge).

4. Interpret Article 30(1) to allow for recourse to sources outside the Statute when determining whether the applicable mental element in a particular case is 'otherwise provided', in circumstances where the Elements of Crimes are silent.

Finally, in my view it would be desirable for Article 30(1) of the Rome Statute to be amended by the Assembly of States Parties to replace the conjunctive 'and' with the disjunctive 'or', to avoid the difficulties involved with requiring both knowledge and intent with respect to consequence elements (and to prevent the perpetrator who plants an unpredictable IED from escaping liability).

BA/LLB (Hons) (University of Melbourne 2006); PhD (Asia Pacific Centre for Military Law, University of Melbourne, 2011); Summary Prosecutor, Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Northern Territory, Australia). This article forms part of the author's PhD thesis, 'Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability: Article 25(3)(b) and (c) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (Martinus Nijhoff 2012, forthcoming).

---

1. Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (adopted 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3.
2. Charter of the International Military Tribunal, annexed to Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of the Major War Criminals of the European Axis (adopted 8 August 1945) 82 UNTS 279 (Nuremberg Charter); Charter of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East (adopted 19 January 1946, amended 26 April 1946) TIAS 1589, 4 Bevans 20

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

(Tokyo Charter).
3. Control Council Law No 10: Punishment of Persons Guilty of War Crimes, Crimes against Peace and against Humanity (adopted 20 December 1945) in Official Gazette of the Control Council for Germany, No 3, Berlin, 31 January 1946, 50-5 (Control Council Law No 10).
4. Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, adopted 25 May 1993, annexed to UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827 (ICTY Statute); Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, adopted 8 November 1994, annexed to UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1994) UN Doc S/RES/955 (ICTR Statute).
5. See, eg, International Law Commission, 'Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind with Commentaries' in 'Report of the International Law Commission to the General Assembly on the Work of its Forty-eighth Session' (6 May-26 July 1996) UN Doc A/51/10.
6. N Pisani, 'The Mental Element in International Crime' in F Lattanzi and WA Schabas (eds), Essays on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Il Sirente 2004) 125.
7. A Cassese, 'Mens Rea and the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia' (2003) 37 New England LR 1015, 1025.
8. G Werle and F Jessberger, '"Unless Otherwise Provided": Article 30 of the ICC Statute and the Mental Element of Crimes under International Criminal Law' (2005) 3 J Int'l Crim Justice 35, 37.
9. H Satzger, 'German Criminal Law and the Rome Statute: A Critical Analysis of the New German Code of Crimes against International Law' (2002) 2 Int'l Crim LR 261, 269.
10. A Eser, 'Mental Elements: Mistake of Fact and Mistake of Law' in A Cassese, P Gaeta and JRWD Jones (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, vol 1 (OUP 2002) 907.
11. Despite the US not being a State Party to the Rome Statute, it has nevertheless had a great influence on the drafting of the statute, and on the development of international criminal law more generally. The US made a significant contribution to the early development of international criminal law through its influence on the Nuremberg and Tokyo Trials, and the trials before the US Nuremberg Military Tribunals. With respect to the Rome Statute specifically, the Model Penal Code prepared by the American Law Institute had considerable impact on the drafting of Article 30 of the Rome Statute and on the 'purposive' element of aiding and abetting under Article 25(3)(c). This article also draws on domestic criminal law principles derived from the United Kingdom and Australia, as the text of Article 30 bears striking resemblance to the equivalent provisions of the English Law Commission's Draft Criminal Code Bill and the Australian Commonwealth Criminal Code.
12. Like US law, German law has had a great influence on the development of international criminal law, with a number of German criminal law professors establishing themselves in the field, and acting as judges of international courts or tribunals (for example, Albin Eser and Hans-Peter Kaul). More importantly, German criminal law theory 'enjoys widespread influence in the civil law world': M Dubber, 'Theories of Crime and Punishment in German Criminal Law' (2005) 53 Amer J Comp L 679, 679. Dubber notes, however, that criminal law in common law countries has, until fairly recently, developed largely independently of German influence (ibid). German law therefore provides a good example against which to compare general principles of law that are recognized across common law systems.
13. M Kelt and H von Hebel, 'General Principles of Criminal Law and the Elements of Crimes' in Roy S Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Transnational Publishers 2001) 22.
14. The term 'intent' is used here in the broad sense, to refer to any mental state that is higher than negligence. Negligence is excluded from the concept of 'intent' in this context, because it is characterized by the absence of any volitional or cognitive component (see Table 1 below). On this point, see G Williams, Criminal Law: The General Part (2nd edn, Stevens & Sons 1961) 31. See also GP Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (OUP 2000) 508-10.
15. See, eg, Prosecutor v Bemba Gombo (Confirmation Decision) ICC-01/05-01/08, PT Ch II (15 June 2009) para 357 (Bemba Confirmation). See also Eser (n 10) 905; William A Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (OUP 2010) 475.
16. The concept of special or additional intent is discussed below in Part IV.
17. I have not been able to find any similar visual representation of the differences between the gradations recognized in common law and civil law countries. The hope is that a visual representation will assist the reader in understanding how the different gradations in these two systems roughly compare.
18. As Clark has put it, 'the civil law is not a monolith; the common law is not a monolith': RS Clark, 'The Mental Element in International Criminal Law: The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Elements of Offences' (2001) 12 Crim L Forum 291, 294.
19. For example, according to van Sliedregt, France does not recognize dolus eventualis as a form of intent: E van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (TMC Asser Press 2003) 46. See also ME Badar, 'Dolus Eventualis and the Rome Statute Without It?' (2009) 12 New Crim LR 433, 455-6;

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

C Elliott, 'France' in K Heller and M Dubber (eds), The Handbook of Comparative Criminal Law (Stanford Law Books 2010) 218.

20. This is particularly the case for dolus eventualis, where even scholars within some countries hotly debate the definition of this gradation of intent (eg in Germany).

21. M Bohlander, Principles of German Criminal Law (Hart Publishing 2009) 63-4. See also Pisani (n 6) 126 ('The accused must have acted with the precise scope or desire to bring about that particular result...').

22. Bohlander (n 21) 64.

23. ibid. See also ME Badar, 'Mens Rea: Mistake of Law and Mistake of Fact in German Criminal Law: A Survey for International Criminal Tribunals' (2005) 5 Int'l Crim LR 203, 222. See also Pisani (n 6) 126-7, 128.

24. US Model Penal Code § 2.02(2)(a)(i).

25. Criminal Code Act 1995 (Australia) s 5.2(1).

26. See A Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law (6th edn, OUP 2009) 171-2.

27. See, eg, Law Commission (England), A Criminal Code for England and Wales: Volume 1, Report and Draft Criminal Code Bill (Report No 177, 1989) 192.

28. Badar, 'Mens Rea' (n 23) 224.

29. Van der Vyver describes this form of intent as 'dolus indirectus', rather than 'direct intent in the second degree': J Van der Vyver, 'The International Criminal Court and the Concept of Mens Rea in International Criminal Law' (2004) 12 Univ Miami Int'l & Comp LR 57, 63. I would submit, however, that he is referring to the same concept.

30. Badar, 'Mens Rea' (n 23) 224.

31. ME Badar, 'The Mental Element in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary from a Comparative Criminal Law Perspective' (2008) 19 Crim L Forum 473, 486 (emphasis in original).

32. While civil law systems make a clear distinction between the two degrees of direct intent (direct intent in the first degree and direct intent in the second degree), this distinction is not as clear when it comes to common law systems. Generally, the first two gradations are referred to simply as 'intention', a category that covers two possible instances: where an individual acts purposely (direct intent) and where an individual acts knowingly (oblique intent). It is for this reason that the dividing line between the two concepts on the common law side of Table 1 is indicated with a dotted line.

33. US Model Penal Code § 2.02(2)(b)(ii).

34. See Ashworth (n 26) 174, discussing the House of Lords decision in R v Woolin [1999] AC 82.

35. G Williams, 'Oblique Intention' (1987) 46 CLJ 417, 421.

36. Criminal Code Act 1995 (Australia) s 5.2(3).

37. Criminal Law Officers Committee of the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (Australia), Model Criminal Code: Chapters 1 and 2, General Principles of Criminal Responsibility: Report (December 1992) 25.

38. See Law Commission (England), Criminal Code, Volume 1 (n 27). Clause 18(b)(ii) provided that a person acts intentionally with respect to a result 'when he acts either in order to bring it about or being aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events' (emphasis added). This Draft Bill was never enacted into law.

39. See Law Commission (England), A Criminal Code for England and Wales: Volume 2, Commentary on Draft Criminal Code Bill (Report No 177, 1989) 192.

40. ibid 193.

41. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (n 14) 445-6; Bohlander (n 21) 64. For example, Weigend states that '[w]ords such as dolus eventualis have, at different times and in different legal systems, acquired different connotations, and it is thus far from clear that speakers from different backgrounds mean the same thing when they use the same Latin expression': T Weigend, 'Intent, Mistake of Law and Co-perpetration in the Lubanga Decision on Confirmation of Charges' (2008) 6 J Int'l Crim Justice 471, 482.

42. Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 51-2.

43. Bohlander (n 21) 64.

44. For a detailed discussion of the various schools of thought, see Badar, 'Mens Rea' (n 23) 228-32; Badar, 'Dolus Eventualis' (n 19) 458-62. See generally G Taylor, 'The Intention Debate in German Criminal Law' (2004) 17(3) Ratio Juris 346. For an analysis of the concept of dolus eventualis in Egypt, France, Italy and South Africa and under Islamic law, see Badar, 'Dolus Eventualis' (n 19) 452-64.

45. Bohlander (n 21) 65.

46. ibid. See also Taylor (n 44) 348; Badar, 'The Mental Element' (n 31) 490.

47. See Law Commission (England), Criminal Code, Volume 2 (n 39) 194.

48. Criminal Law Officers Committee (Australia) (n 37) 27. The US Model Penal Code provides in § 2.02(2)(c): 'A person acts recklessly with respect to a material element of an offense when he consciously disregards a substantial and unjustifiable risk that the material element exists or will result from his conduct. The risk must be of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature and purpose of the actor's conduct and the circumstances known to him, its disregard involves a gross deviation from the standard of conduct that a law-abiding person would observe in the actor's situation.' The Australian Model Criminal Code (which became the Commonwealth Criminal Code) did not adopt the requirement of a 'gross deviation'.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

49. Criminal Code Act 1995 (Australia) s 5.4(2).

50. Criminal Law Officers Committee (Australia) (n 37) 27. For a discussion of the law relating to recklessness in England, Canada and the US, see Badar, 'The Mental Element' (n 31) 488-9.

51. This is the position taken by Ambos, who situates recklessness somewhere between dolus eventualis and conscious negligence: K Ambos, 'General Principles of Criminal Law in the Rome Statute' (1999) 10 Crim L Forum 1, 21. Similarly, Triffterer situates recklessness between dolus eventualis and negligence: O Triffterer, 'The New International Criminal Law: Its General Principles Establishing Individual Criminal Responsibility' in K Koufa (ed), The New International Criminal Law (Sakkoulas Publications 2003) 709. This is also the position taken by Eser, who views recklessness as being more the equivalent of conscious negligence. In his view, the volitional element in recklessness is entirely lacking: Eser (n 10) 906. Van Sliedregt (n 19) 46 views recklessness as being 'broader' than dolus eventualis. See also Wise, who states that 'dolus eventualis demands that the accused have a particular subjective posture toward the possible consequences of his conduct, where common law terminology minimizes the relevance of the accused's desires, wishes, or wants': E Wise, 'General Principles of Criminal Law' (1998) 13 Nouvelles Études Pénales: Model Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court Based on the Preparatory Committee's Text to the Diplomatic Conference, Rome, June 15-July 17 1998 39, 53.

52. As Badar notes, the ICTY Trial Chamber has held that the common law concept of recklessness is not equivalent to the civil law concept of dolus eventualis, because of the lack of any volitional component for recklessness. Badar states that the trial judgment in the Stakic case 'clearly shows that mere common law recklessness is not equivalent to the continental law dolus eventualis. The latter requires a cognitive element of awareness and a volitional element of acceptance of the risk, whereas mere recklessness lacks such a volitional element': ME Badar, 'Drawing the Boundaries of Mens Rea in the Jurisprudence of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia' (2006) 6 Int'l Crim LR 313, 332, citing Prosecutor v Stakic (Judgment) IT-97-24-T, T Ch II (31 July 2003) para 642. While I do not agree that there is no volitional component required for the gradation of recklessness, I do consider that this volitional component is lower than that which exists in cases of dolus eventualis.

53. See Prosecutor v Lubanga Dyilo (Confirmation Decision) ICC/01/04-01/06, PT Ch I (29 January 2007) at fn 438 (Lubanga Confirmation).

54. Cassese seems to take this view, as he equates the two concepts and also states that recklessness requires a volitional act: A Cassese, International Criminal Law (2nd edn, OUP 2008) 66-7.

55. G Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law (2nd edn, TMC Asser Press 2009) 153 (fn 90). See also Taylor (n 44) 348 (who describes dolus eventualis as 'tak[ing] the place of the missing concept of recklessness' in German criminal law) and Wise (n 51) 53 (who states that '[r]ecklessness and dolus eventualis are not identical, although, as a practical matter, they are likely to produce similar results in most cases').

56. D Piragoff and D Robinson, 'Article 30: Mental Element' in O Triffterer (ed), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: Observers' Notes, Article by Article (2nd edn, Beck 2008) 854. See also Eser (n 10) 905.

57. Pisani (n 6) 129; Eser (n 10) 905, 907. However, the terms 'intent' and 'knowledge' as used in Article 30 do not themselves equate to 'volition' and 'cognition'. Rather, they are legal terms defined in paragraphs (2) and (3) of Article 30 respectively, while the terms 'volition' (ie desire) and 'cognition' (ie awareness) are the two components that must both be present in each of the gradations of 'intent'/'knowledge'.

58. See, eg, Bemba Confirmation (n 15) para 355. This 'element analysis' approach was designed by the drafters of the US Model Penal Code: see US Model Penal Code § 1.13(9); P Robinson and J Grall, 'Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond' (1983) 35 Stanford LR 681. In fact, Heller states that Article 30's element analysis approach 'is similar to, and almost certainly based on, the approach taken by the Model Penal Code': KJ Heller, 'The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' in KJ Heller and MD Dubber (eds), The Handbook of Comparative Criminal Law (Stanford Law Books 2010) 603. See also Badar, 'The Mental Element' (n 31) 476. The element analysis approach has also been adopted by a number of model or draft criminal codes prepared in common law countries, for example, the English Law Commission's Draft Criminal Code Bill and the Australian Commonwealth Criminal Code: Law Commission (England), Criminal Code, Volume 1 (n 27) 51-2 (clause 18); Criminal Code Act 1995 (Australia) Div 5.

59. M Kelt and H von Hebel, 'What Are Elements of Crimes?' in RS Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Transnational Publishers 2001) 14.

60. GP Fletcher, The Grammar of Criminal Law (OUP 2007) 43.

61. Badar, 'The Mental Element' (n 31) 476. See also Robinson and Grall (n 58) which states (at 683) that under an 'offence analysis' 'one spoke of intentional offenses, reckless offenses, and negligent offenses... [whereas an 'element analysis'] recognize[s] that a single offense definition may require a different culpable state of mind for each objective element of the offense'.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

62. This follows the approach of the US Model Penal Code, which recognizes 'conduct', 'result[s] of conduct' and 'attendant circumstances' as the possible elements of a crime: see US Model Penal Code § 2.02.

63. The US Model Penal Code similarly did not provide any usable definitions for these terms, an omission that Robinson and Grall have described as having 'severely undercut' the usefulness of the defined mental elements: Robinson and Grall (n 58) 707.

64. Piragoff and Robinson (n 56) 852. See also Kelt and von Hebel, 'What Are Elements of Crimes?' (n 59) 14. Similarly, Heller describes a conduct element as 'the positive act or omission prohibited by the crime in question': Heller (n 58) 602. According to Cassese, '[t]he conduct is described by the international rule that imposes a certain behaviour... and therefore criminalizes any act or omission contrary to such a rule': Cassese, International Criminal Law (n 54) 55.

65. Werle (n 55) 144.

66. Piragoff and Robinson (n 56) 852. Similarly, Heller describes a consequence element as 'the required result of the prohibited conduct' (which may involve 'either actual harm ... or simply the possibility of harm'): Heller (n 58) 602. Werle describes a consequence as including 'all effects of the criminal conduct' and explains that they can consist of 'harm that has actually occurred ... or merely of danger to a protected right': Werle (n 55) 144. See also Kelt and von Hebel, 'What Are Elements of Crimes?' (n 59) 15.

67. Piragoff and Robinson (n 56) 852.

68. Heller (n 58) 602. Werle explains that '[o]bjective circumstances can be of a factual nature ... or they can concern normative characteristics': Werle (n 55) 145. See also Eser, who defines circumstances as 'any objective or subjective facts, qualities, or motives with regard to the subject of the crime (such as the perpetrator and any accomplices), the object of the crime (such as the victim or other impaired interests) or any other modalities of the crime (such as means or time and place of commission)': Eser (n 10) 919. See also Kelt and von Hebel, 'What Are Elements of Crimes?' (n 59) 15.

69. Robinson and Grall (n 58) 707.

70. Kelt and von Hebel, 'What Are Elements of Crimes?' (n 59) 15. As Clark notes, there is often overlap between 'conduct' and 'circumstances', and many of those involved in the drafting of the Rome Statute 'thought of conduct as including causation and results': Clark, 'The Mental Element' (n 18) 306. The difficulty in drawing the dividing line between 'conduct' and 'circumstances' was also recognized in the Commentary to the Australian Model Criminal Code: Criminal Law Officers Committee (n 37) 7.

71. Robinson and Grall (n 58) 719-20.

72. See ICC, Elements of Crimes, Article 8(2)(b)(viii), Element 1(a).

73. See ibid, Article 7(1) (k), Element 1.

74. Robinson and Grall (n 58) 723.

75. ibid 724 (emphasis omitted).

76. ibid.

77. See ICC, Elements of Crimes, Article 8(2)(b)(xxv), Element 1.

78. Robinson and Grall (n 58) 724.

79. As is the case with Table 1, Table 2 is my attempt to visually represent the definitions contained in Article 30, arranged with respect to the relevant material element.

80. ICC, Elements of Crimes, General Introduction, 2 (emphasis added).

81. Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 38. See also Werle (n 55) 151.

82. See Triffterer (n 51) 704.

83. This is also the position taken by Badar, 'The Mental Element' (n 31) 482-3.

84. Lubanga Confirmation (n 53) para 351.

85. Bemba Confirmation (n 15) para 358.

86. Prosecutor v Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui (Confirmation Decision) ICC-01/04-01/07, PT Ch I (30 September 2008) para 529 (Katanga Confirmation).

87. See Table 2 above.

88. Lubanga Confirmation (n 53) para 351 (emphases added).

89. This is the position taken by Eser (n 10) 914-15.

90. See Bemba Confirmation (n 15) para 358 (stating that 'the volitional element decreases substantially and is overridden by the cognitive element'), and para 369 (stating that the standard is that of 'virtual certain[ty]').

91. This was the meaning intended by the English Law Commission, which was the first body to use the phrase: see Law Commission (England), Criminal Code, Volume 2 (n 39) 192.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

92. Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 41; Badar, 'The Mental Element' (n 31) 484-5; Badar, 'Dolus Eventualis' (n 15) 440. See also Pisani (n 6) 131.
93. Bemba Confirmation (n 15) para 359 (emphasis added). See also Lubanga Confirmation (n 53) paras 351-2; Katanga Confirmation (n 86) para 530.
94. Badar, 'Dolus Eventualis' (n 15) 452. Clark similarly states that the 1996 Report of the Preparatory Committee was 'the last time that the words dolus eventualis appear in any draft': R Clark, 'Elements of Crimes in Early Confirmation Decisions of Pre-Trial Chambers of the International Criminal Court' (2008) 6 NZ YB Int'l L 215.
95. Clark, 'The Mental Element' (n 18) 301. Clark has stated elsewhere that 'dolus eventualis and its common law cousin, recklessness, suffered banishment by consensus [at Rome]. If it is to be read into the Statute, it is in the teeth of the language and history': R Clark, 'Drafting a General Part to a Penal Code: Some Thoughts Inspired by the Negotiations of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and by the Court's First Substantive Law Discussion in the Lubunga Dyilo Confirmation Proceedings' (2008) 19 Crim L Forum 519, 529; Clark, 'Elements of Crimes' (n 94) 220.
96. The provision defining recklessness was ostensibly dropped because the term did not appear anywhere in the final text of the Statute, so there was no need to define it. See W Schabas, 'General Principles of Criminal Law in the International Criminal Court Statute' (Pt III) (1998) 6 EJ Crime, Crim L & Crim Justice 409, 420; W Schabas, Introduction to the International Criminal Court (3rd edn, CUP 2007) 224; Clark, 'Elements of Crimes' (n 94) 216; Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 52; Wise (n 55) 52.
97. Clark, 'Drafting a General Part' (n 95) 525. See also Clark, 'Elements of Crimes' (n 94) 212, 216.
98. Pisani (n 6) 132 (emphasis added).
99. ibid. However, note that, in other places, Pisani seems to suggest that Article 30 includes dolus eventualis and recklessness (ibid 125, 134).
100. Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 52.
101. Ambos, 'General Principles' (n 51) 21.
102. See, eg, Piragoff and Robinson (n 56) 860 (fn 67). See also Eser (n 10) 906. Despite this recognition, some academics clearly view the failure to allow for recklessness as a standard gradation of mental element in Article 30 as 'questionable', given its status under customary international law (and, in particular, the heavy reliance on recklessness as a sufficient gradation of mental element for serious crimes in the jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals): see, eg, A Cassese, 'The Statute of the International Criminal Court: Some Preliminary Reflections' (1999) 10 EJIL 158, 153.
103. Lubanga Confirmation (n 53) fn 438.
104. ibid.
105. Bemba Confirmation (n 15) para 360.
106. Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 41, 53.
107. Eser (n 10) 932-3 (and see also 915).
108. Ambos, 'General Principles' (n 51) 21-2. See also K Ambos, 'Some Preliminary Reflections on the Mens Rea Requirements of the Crimes of the ICC Statute and of the Elements of Crimes' in LC Vohrah and others (eds), Man's Inhumanity to Man: Essays on International Law in Honour of Antonio Cassese (Kluwer Law International 2003) 20-1. However, note Ambos' more recent statement below, which seems to contradict this position: see text accompanying n 118.
109. Heller (n 58) 604.
110. Van Sliedregt (n 19) 51-2.
111. Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 41 (fn 36).
112. H-H Jescheck, 'The General Principles of International Criminal Law Set Out in Nuremberg, as Mirrored in the ICC Statute' (2004) 2 J Int'l Crim Justice 38, 45.
113. F Mantovani, 'The General Principles of International Criminal Law: The Viewpoint of a National Criminal Lawyer' (2003) 1 J Int'l Crim Justice 26, 32.
114. G-J Knoops, Defenses in Contemporary International Criminal Law (2nd edn, Martinus Nijhoff 2007) 5.
115. Triffterer (n 51) 706.
116. Cassese, International Criminal Law (n 54) 73.
117. Piragoff and Robinson (n 56) 860.
118. K Ambos, 'Critical Issues in the Bemba Confirmation Decision' (2009) 22 Leiden J Int'l L 715, 718. However, Ambos also states that he concurs with the exclusion of dolus eventualis from Article 30.
119. Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 42. The 'principle of strict construction' refers to Article 22(2), which provides that '[t]he definition of a crime shall be strictly construed and shall not be extended by analogy'. See also T Weigend, 'The Harmonization of General Principles of Criminal Law: The Statutes and Jurisprudence of the ICTY, ICTR and the ICC: An Overview' (2004) 19 Nouvelles Études Pénales: Quo Vadis? 319, 327 (fn 19).
120. Lubanga Confirmation (n 53) para 352.
121. ibid paras 353-5.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

122. Weigend, 'Lubanga Decision' (n 41) 482-3.
123. See Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 42, 53-4.
124. In the Katanga Confirmation, which was handed down between the Lubanga Confirmation and the Bemba Confirmation, Pre-Trial Chamber I stated that the majority of the Chamber (Judge U%24sacka dissenting) 'endorse[d]' the previous finding in the Lubanga Confirmation that Article 30 incorporates dolus eventualis: Katanga Confirmation (n 86) fn 329. It stated, however, that '[f]or the purpose of the present charges in the present Decision, it is not necessary to determine whether situations of dolus eventualis could also be covered by this offence, since, as shown later, there are substantial grounds to believe that the crimes were committed with dolus directus ': ibid, fn 329. See also at para 531, where the Chamber stated that it need not take a position on 'whether the concept of dolus eventualis has a place within the framework of article 30', because it did not intend to rely on this concept for the mental element in relation to the crimes charged.
125. Bemba Confirmation (n 15) para 360.
126. ibid paras 362-3.
127. ibid paras 364-8.
128. As Piragoff and Robinson explain, in domestic legal systems that recognize the concept of 'wilful blindness', it is treated as tantamount to actual knowledge: Piragoff and Robinson (n 56) 861.
129. See, eg, Law Commission (England), Criminal Code, Volume 2 (n 39) 191-2. See also Piragoff and Robinson (n 56) 861.
130. Piragoff and Robinson (n 56) 861.
131. A proposal for a draft provision on mental elements submitted to the Preparatory Committee in 1996 provided that: 'For the purposes of this Statute and unless otherwise provided, "know", "knowingly" or "knowledge" means: ... (b) [To be aware that there is a substantial likelihood that a circumstance exists and deliberately to avoid taking steps to confirm whether that circumstance exists] [to be wilfully blind to the fact that a circumstance exists or that a consequence will occur]': Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN Doc A/51/22 (13 September 1996) Volume II: Compilation of Proposals, art H(3)(b). This paragraph did not appear in any later draft provisions on the mental element.
132. Eser (n 10) 931-2.
133. Badar, 'The Mental Element' (n 31) 496.
134. ibid.
135. ibid (emphasis added).
136. ibid, citing Williams, Criminal Law (n 14) 159.
137. See, eg, Bemba Confirmation (n 15) paras 136, 353 (describing the language of Article 30(1) as establishing a 'default rule').
138. Weigend, 'Harmonization' (n 119) 327.
139. Eser (n 10) 898. Triffterer also appears to favour this line of reasoning: Triffterer (n 51) 699-700.
140. K Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts (2002) 789, cited in Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 43.
141. Schabas, Introduction (n 96) 225. In light of the recent jurisprudence of the Court (see below n 152), Schabas appears to have changed his position in his more recent book, where he states that 'article 21 lists [the Elements] as a source of applicable law, and to the extent that [alternative mental elements] are "provided" by such a source, they may be deemed "otherwise provided"': Schabas, Commentary (n 15) 475.
142. C Kreß, 'The Crime of Genocide under International Law' (2006) 6 Int'l Crim LR 461, 485 (emphasis in original).
143. See, eg, Clark, 'The Mental Element' (n 18) 321 (submitting that an alternative mental element 'might be based on the general law, and in particular applicable treaties, customary law and general principles of law'); Badar, 'The Mental Element' (n 31) 500 (stating that Article 30(1) 'enables the Statute to absorb the corresponding rules of international humanitarian law'); Cassese, International Criminal Law (n 54) 74. For an explanation of the approach taken by the Preparatory Commission in the Elements of Crimes, see Mauro Politi, 'Elements of Crimes' in Cassese, Gaeta and Jones (n 10) 461; Kelt and von Hebel, 'General Principles' (n 13) 29.
144. Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 45.
145. ibid 46 (emphasis in original).
146. ibid.
147. See Piragoff and Robinson (n 56) 856.
148. ibid.
149. Elements of Crimes, General Introduction, 2 (emphasis added).
150. See Piragoff and Robinson (n 56) 856.
151. Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (adopted 23 May 1969, entered into force 27 January 1980) 1155 UNTS 331, art 31(3).

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

152. See Lubanga Confirmation (n 53) paras 356-9, where Pre-Trial Chamber I of the ICC accepted that the Elements of Crimes--which required only negligence with respect to the age of the victims in the case of Article 8(2)(b)(xxvi) (War crime of using, conscripting or enlisting children)--represented 'an exception to the "intent and knowledge" requirement embodied in article 30 of the Statute': at para 359. However, as Clark notes, '[w]hether the negligence exception is consistent with the Statute, as understood in Article 9(3), is a question that will no doubt be argued by the defence [in the Lubanga case] at a later stage': Clark, 'Elements of Crimes' (n 94) 222. See also Bemba Confirmation (n 15) paras 136, 353, where Pre-Trial Chamber II stated that 'it must be established that the material elements of the respective crime were committed with "intent and knowledge", unless the Statute or the Elements of Crimes require a different standard of fault' (emphasis added).
153. Although it is heavily criticized by Clark: Clark, 'Drafting a General Part' (n 95) 525 (fn 18); Clark, 'Elements of Crimes' (n 94) 214 (fn 14).
154. Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 44, 46-7. See also Eser (n 10) 901.
155. For an example of recklessness, see, eg, Article 8(2)(a)(iv), where the use of the term 'wantonly' reduces the level of the required mental state to recklessness. For an example of negligence, see, eg, Article 28(a)(i), which provides that a commander shall be criminally responsible for crimes committed by forces under his or her command not only when that military commander knew but also where the commander 'should have known' that such crimes were being committed. See also the Elements of Crimes for Article 8(2)(b)(xxvi) (the war crime of using child soldiers), which provides that the Prosecution need only prove that an accused 'should have known' that a soldier was a minor.
156. See the example of Article 28 cited in n 155 above.
157. See above n 155.
158. Pre-Trial Chamber I has accepted such an example in Lubanga Confirmation (n 53) paras 356-9 (concerning the war crime of using child soldiers).
159. Eser (n 10) 899, 900.
160. Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 48.
161. Piragoff and Robinson (n 56) 856-8.
162. ibid 857. See also Cassese, International Criminal Law (n 54) 65.
163. Piragoff and Robinson (n 56) 858. Kelt and von Hebel also agree that such additional mental elements have no particular material element connected to them: 'General Principles' (n 13) 31, 32. See also Triffterer (n 51) 703.
164. Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 48. On the concept of additional mental elements, see Commonwealth Attorney-General's Department (Australia), The Commonwealth Criminal Code: A Guide for Practitioners (March 2002) 61. The Guide refers to these additional mental elements as 'ulterior intentions', and explains that they 'characteristically take the form of a prohibition against engaging in conduct with intention to achieve some further objective' (emphasis in original). It further explains that while liability in these crimes 'is determined by the offender's objective, the achievement of that objective is not itself a physical element of the offence.'
165. However, as noted above, given that Article 30 imposes such a demanding test for both intent and knowledge, it is unlikely that there is any room left for this category.
166. Badar, 'The Mental Element' (n 31) 484; Cassese, International Criminal Law (n 54) 66.
167. Triffterer (n 51) 703.
168. This was identified as a 'specific intent' requirement in Bemba Confirmation (n 15) paras 293-4.
169. This was identified as an 'additional subjective element', 'specific intent' or 'dolus specialis' requirement in Prosecutor v Al Bashir (Decision on Application for an Arrest Warrant) ICC-02/05-01/09, PT Ch I (4 March 2009) para 139.
170. This was identified as a 'specific intent' or 'dolus specialis' requirement in ibid para 141.
171. This was identified as a 'dolus specialis' requirement in Katanga Confirmation (n 86) para 332, and a 'specific intent' or 'additional special intent' requirement in Bemba Confirmation (n 15) paras 320, 331.
172. For an example of the approach taken by a domestic legal system on this point, see Commonwealth Attorney-General's Department (Australia), The Commonwealth Criminal Code: A Guide for Practitioners (March 2002) 61. The Guide explains that, since 'ulterior intentions' are not defined in the Code, the content of the mental element in these contexts 'is determined by ordinary usage and common law'. The Guide notes, however, that the definition of 'intent' provided in the Code, while not directly applicable, would provide a 'persuasive analogy' (at 63).
173. Satzger (n 9) 269.
174. Cassese, 'Mens Rea' (n 7) 1025.
175. Werle and Jessberger (n 8) 37.
176. Eser (n 10) 907.

END OF DOCUMENT

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

© 2012 Thomson Reuters.

5961

MARTINUS NIJHOFF PUBLISHERS

International Criminal Law Review 12 (2012) 1–70

International Criminal Law Review

brill.nl/icla

Individual Criminal Responsibility before the International Criminal Court
A Comparison with the Ad Hoc Tribunals

Barbara Goy[1]
Legal Officer (Appeals), Office of the Prosecutor, International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia

Abstract
For more than 15 years the two ad hoc Tribunals, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR), have interpreted the requirements of different forms of individual criminal responsibility. It is thus helpful to look at whether and to what extent the jurisprudence of the ICTY/ICTR may provide guidance to the International Criminal Court (ICC). To this end, this article compares the requirements of individual criminal responsibility at the ICTY/ICTR and the ICC. The article concludes that, applied with caution, the jurisprudence of the ICTY/ICTR – as an expression of international law – can assist in interpreting the modes of liability under the ICC Statute. ICTY/ICTR case law seems to be most helpful with regard to accessorial forms of liability, in particular their objective elements. Moreover, it may assist in interpreting the subjective requirements set out in Article 30 ICC Statute.

Keywords
individual criminal responsibility; modes of liability; International Criminal Court (ICC); International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY); International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR)

1. Introduction

The most serious crimes of international concern are rarely committed by one individual alone but usually involve larger numbers of persons. International criminal law as applied by the ICC and the ad hoc Tribunals, the ICTY and ICTR,[2] mostly focuses on the organisers or masterminds of such atrocities.

[1] The views expressed herein are those of the author alone and do not necessarily reflect the views of the ICTY, the Office of the Prosecutor of the ICTY or the United Nations in general. The author wishes to thank especially Helen Brady, Reinhold Gallmetzer, Fergal Gaynor and Steffen Wirth for their helpful comments.

[2] The judges of the ICTY Appeals Chamber are the same as those of the ICTR Appeals Chamber, thus the decisions of one Appeals Chamber are highly persuasive with the other, Prosecutor v. Miroslav Kvočka et al. (IT-98-30/1-A), Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 28 February 2005, Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, para. 41.

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2012

DOI 10.1163/157181212X616522

3335

5962

be certain which crime will ultimately be committed. Rather, it is sufficient if he or she is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed.[439]

Consistent with the subjective requirements for ordering, instigating and planning, the awareness of a probability/substantial likelihood should be sufficient with regard to both, the assistance and the crime of the principal.[440] In this sense, a Trial Chamber at the Special Court for Sierra Leone in Brima et al. held:

> The mens rea required for aiding and abetting is that the accused knew that his acts would assist the commission of the crime by the perpetrator or that he was aware of the substantial likelihood that his acts would assist the commission of a crime by the perpetrator.[441]

6.2. ICC

Article 25(3)(c) ICC Statute provides for aiding, abetting or otherwise assisting in the commission or attempted commission of a crime, including providing the means for its commission.[442]

While at the ICTY/ICTR aiding and abetting are used as one concept,[443] it has been suggested that at the ICC each term has its own meaning, and that 'assistance' serves as an umbrella term.[444]

The ICC Statute does not specify how strongly the assistance must impact on the principal's commission of the crime. According to one view, the use of the word 'facilitating' confirms that direct and substantial assistance is not required and that the act of assistance need not be a conditio sine qua non for the commission of the crime.[445] Other legal scholars take the view that – as at the ICTY/ICTR – the assistance has to have a substantial effect on the commission of the crime.[446] The latter seems to be consistent with the structure of Article 25(3) ICC

---

439) Haradinaj et al. Appeal Judgement, supra note 438, para. 58; Blaškić Appeal Judgement, supra note 6, para. 50; Simić Appeal Judgement, supra note 51, para. 86.

440) See also submissions of the prosecution in the ICTY case of Blagojević & Jokić, summarized in Blagojević & Jokić Appeal Judgement, supra note 424, paras. 219-220 and footnote 577.

441) Prosecutor v. Alex Tamba Brima et al. (SCSL-04-16-T), Judgement, Trial Chamber II, 20 June 2007, para. 776; confirmed on appeal: Prosecutor v. Alex Tamba Brima et al. (SCSL-2004-16-A), Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 22 February 2008, para. 243.

442) Art. 25(3)(c) ICC Statute provides: "For the purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime, aids, abets or otherwise assists in its commission or its attempted commission, including providing the means for its commission".

443) The Prosecutor v. Laurent Semanza (ICTR-97-20-T), Judgement and Sentence, Trial Chamber III, 15 May 2003, para. 385; Orić Trial Judgement, supra note 5, para. 280; for the distinction between the two concepts see The Prosecutor v. Sylvestre Gacumbitsi (ICTR-2001-64-T), Judgement, Trial Chamber III, para. 286 and Semanza Trial Judgement, para. 384.

444) Eser, Individual Criminal Responsibility, supra note 377, p. 798.

445) Ambos, Article 25, supra note 254, p. 760.

446) Werle, Individual Criminal Responsibility, supra note 9, p. 969; Eser, Individual Criminal Responsibility, supra note 377, pp. 800-801.

3336

5963

Statute, which can be understood as listing modes of liability in order of seriousness:[447] Article 25(3)(a) ICC Statute, 'committing', contains the highest degree of criminal liability, since it constitutes a principal form of liability. Committing jointly requires an essential contribution in order to enable the co-perpetrators to jointly control the crime.[448] The 'substantial effect' which is suggested here to be required for Article 25(3)(c) ICC Statute requires less than the 'essential contribution'.[449] This is consistent with aiding and abetting being an accessorial form of liability. Accordingly, the contribution does not have to be essential so as to render control over the crime.

Although the wording "or otherwise assists" could suggest that no particular threshold is required, the structure of Article 25(3) ICC Statute speaks in favour of a certain threshold. Article 25(3)(c) ICC Statute is followed by Article 25(3)(d) ICC Statute which foresees contributions "[i]n any other way". This suggests that the assistance required for Article 25(3)(c) ICC Statute is more than that required by (d). A way to distinguish between the contributions required for Article 25(3)(c) and (d) ICC Statute is to require a substantial contribution for (c) and a significant one (which does not have to be substantial) for (d), applying the distinction used in the ICTY jurisprudence for JCE contributions.[450]

While the jurisprudence of the ICTY/ICTR can be used to interpret the objective elements, particularly the type of conduct and the causal connection required, the ICC Statute has its own subjective requirements.

According to Article 25(3)(c) ICC Statute, the assistant must act "for the purpose of facilitating the commission of the crime". This introduces a subjective threshold which goes beyond the subjective elements required by Article 30 ICC Statute.[451] It also goes beyond the subjective requirements for aiding and abetting applied at the ICTY and ICTR. This purpose requirement means that mere knowledge that the assistant aids the commission of the offence is not sufficient. Rather, the assistant must want that his or her assistance facilitates the commission of the crime.[452] On the other hand, it is not required that the assistant possesses the mens rea required for the crime, such as the genocidal intent.[453] "For the purpose of facilitating" could be read as relating only to the act of assistance, so that regarding the crime of the principal Article 30 ICC Statute would apply.[454] 447) See also Werle, Principles, supra note 55, p. 169.

---

448) See supra 3.3.2.1.
449) Werle, Individual Criminal Responsibility, supra note 9, p. 969.
450) See Brđanin Appeal Judgement, supra note 62, para. 430; see also Cryer, supra note 313, p. 247.
451) See also Ambos, Article 25, supra note 254, p. 760.
452) Eser, Individual Criminal Responsibility, supra note 377, p. 801 refers to "wish".
453) Werle, Individual Criminal Responsibility, supra note 9, p. 969; see however Clark, supra note 384, p. 547.
454) Eser, Individual Criminal Responsibility, supra note 377, p. 801; Van Sliedregt, Criminal Responsibility, supra note 156, p. 88.

3337

5964

THE AMERICAN MODEL PENAL CODE: A BRIEF OVERVIEW

Paul H. Robinson and Markus D. Dubber

If there can be said to be an "American criminal code," the Model Penal Code is it. Nonetheless, there remains an enormous diversity among the fifty-two American penal codes, including some that have never adopted a modern code format or structure. Yet, even within the minority of states without a modern code, the Model Penal Code has great influence, as courts regularly rely upon it to fashion the law that the state's criminal code fails to provide. In this essay we provide a brief introduction to this historic document, its origins, and its content.

INTRODUCTION

Within the United States, there are fifty-two American criminal codes, with the federal criminal code overlaying the codes of each of the fifty states and the District of Columbia. Under the U.S. Constitution, the power to impose criminal liability is reserved primarily to the states, with federal authority limited to the prohibition and punishment of offenses specially related to federal interests (including crimes committed on property of exclusive federal jurisdiction such as military bases, crimes against certain federal officers, and crimes that involve conduct in more than one state that is difficult for a single state to effectively prosecute, such as drug

*Colin S. Diver Professor of Law, University of Pennsylvania.

Professor of Law & Director, Buffalo Criminal Law Center, State University of New York at Buffalo.

New Criminal Law Review, Vol. 10, Number 3, pps 319–341. ISSN 1933-4192, electronic ISSN 1933-4206. © 2007 by the Regents of the University of California. All rights reserved. Please direct all requests for permission to photocopy or reproduce article content through the University of California Press's Rights and Permissions website, http://www.ucpressjournals.com/reprintInfo.asp. DOI: 10.1525/ncir.2007.10.3.319.

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 319 2007

3338

5965

and organized crime offenses).[1] The vast bulk of crimes and essentially all "street" crimes—homicide, rape, robbery, assault, and theft—fall under jurisdiction of one of the fifty state criminal codes or the code of the District of Columbia.

There is much diversity among the fifty-two American criminal codes and, therefore, it is often difficult to state "the" American rule on any point of criminal law. But there also are many similarities among the codes, in large part due to the influence of the American Law Institute's Model Penal Code. Promulgated in 1962, the code prompted a wave of state code reforms in the 1960s and 1970s, each influenced by the Model Penal Code.

Some of the Model Penal Code provisions have not been widely accepted. For example, while the Model Penal Code generally rejects the common law's "felony murder" rule, which in its broadest form holds all killings in the course of a felony to be murder, most states have retained the rule. Similarly, a majority of states have rejected the Model Penal Code's innovation in prescribing the same punishment for inchoate offenses, such as attempt, and consummated offenses.

Nonetheless, the Model Penal Code is the closest thing to being an American criminal code. The federal criminal code is too unsystematic and incomplete in theory and too irrelevant in practice to function as a national code. Where states have not followed the Model Penal Code, the divergences locate points of controversy that often continue today. And the code and its commentaries have been the intellectual focus of much American criminal law scholarship since the code's promulgation.[2]

I. THE HISTORY OF THE MODEL PENAL CODE

The Model Penal Code was not the first or the most ambitious, but far and away the most successful attempt to codify American criminal law. To appreciate the Model Penal Code's significance, it must be placed within the

1. More specifically, the states' criminal law power derives from their "police power." The federal government has no police power and therefore must rest its criminal-law making on other grounds, most notably the power to regulation interstate commerce. See Markus D. Dubber & Mark G. Kelman, American Criminal Law: Cases, Statutes, and Comments 2–3 (2005); see generally Markus D. Dubber, The Police Power: Patriarchy and the Foundations of American Government (2005).

2. See generally Markus D. Dubber, Criminal Law: Model Penal Code §§ 1–2 (2002); Paul H. Robinson, Criminal Law § 2.1 (1997).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 320 2007

3339

5966

spotty history of American criminal codification.[3] Unlike the development in continental Europe, modern criminal law in the United States did not arrive in the form of criminal codes. Rather than concern themselves with the threat of punishment, American reformers pragmatically proceeded directly to reform the punishment itself. In the new field of corrections, Americans led the way. As a French resident of Philadelphia noted admiringly in 1796, "the attempt at an almost entire abolition of the punishment of death, and the substitution of a system of reason and justice, to that of bonds, ill-treatment, and arbitrary punishment, was never made but in America."[4] As early as 1776, Thomas Jefferson had drafted a bill for the Virginia legislature that called for punishment based on the theory of prevention outlined by Cesare Beccaria and developed by Jeremy Bentham.[5] The final two decades of the eighteenth century brought the establishment of solitary confinement prisons in Philadelphia and then in New York and other states, including Virginia. 1823 saw the opening of the prison in Auburn, New York, to which visitors flocked from around the world, including Alexis de Tocqueville.[6]

American criminal codes were first compiled by Edward Livingston and later David Dudley Field. Livingston's elaborate drafts for a federal criminal code and a Louisiana criminal code, completed in 1826, were both the most ambitious and the least successful efforts at criminal law codification in the United States. Livingston's penal code was Benthamite both in scope and in substance. The penal code was divided into four separate codes comprising all aspects of penal law, from the definition of penal norms in a "Code of Crimes and Punishments," to the imposition of those norms in a "Code of Procedure" and a "Code of Evidence," and eventually

3. For a more detailed treatment of the history of Anglo-American criminal codification, see Sanford H. Kadish, Codifiers of the Criminal Law, in Blame and Punishment: Essays in the Criminal Law 205 (1987).

4. François-Alexandre-Frédéric La Rochefoucauld-Liancourt, On the Prisons in Philadelphia 33 (1796) (quoted in Louis P. Masur, Rites of Execution: Capital Punishment and the Transformation of American Culture, 1776–1865, at 71 (1989)).

5. For a critical appraisal of Jefferson's draft, see Markus D. Dubber, "An Extraordinarily Beautiful Document": Jefferson's Bill for Proportioning Crimes and Punishments and the Challenge of Republican Punishment, in Modern Histories of Crime and Punishment (Markus D. Dubber & Lindsay Farmer eds., 2007).

6. See Gustave de Beaumont & Alexis de Tocqueville, On the Penitentiary System in the United States and Its Application in France (1833).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 321 2007

3340

5967

to the actual infliction of sanctions in a "Code of Reform and Prison Discipline."[7] Each aspect of the penal law, and each corresponding code, was individually, and as a system, designed to rationalize penal law on the utilitarian principle that Bentham had derived from Cesare Beccaria's famous treatise On Crimes and Punishments: la massima felicità divisa nel maggior numero.[8]

David Dudley Field was both far less ambitious, and far more successful, as a criminal codifier. A successful New York lawyer, Field's codification efforts extended beyond the penal law and reflected pragmatic concerns about the accessibility of law, most importantly to lawyers.[9] Field's codes were designed to simplify legal practice by sparing attorneys the tedium of having to sift through an ever rising mountain of common law opinions. As a result, Field was more concerned with streamlining than he was with systematizing or even reforming New York penal law. Field's New York Penal Code was submitted to the legislature in 1865, and passed into law in 1881.[10] It remained in force until it was replaced by the New York Penal Law of 1967.

That New York Penal Law, like the revised criminal codes of many other states, was based in large part on the American Law Institute's Model Penal Code, which had been published in 1962. In fact, Herbert Wechsler, the Chief Reporter of the Model Penal Code, served on the legislative commission that drafted the New York code.[11]

The Model Penal Code combined Livingston's systematic ambition and integrated utilitarian approach with Field's pragmatism and legislative success. When the Model Penal Code project was launched in 1951, the vast majority of American criminal codes were in a sorry state. Only Louisiana had undertaken a serious effort to reform its criminal code since

---

7. See Edward Livingston, The Complete Works of Edward Livingston on Criminal Jurisprudence (1873).

8. Cesare Beccaria, Dei delitti e delle pene (1764). On the relation between Bentham and Beccaria, see H.L.A. Hart, Bentham and Beccaria, in Essays on Bentham: Studies in Jurisprudence and Political Theory 40 (1982).

9. New York Field Codes (1850–1865).

10. 4 New York Field Codes (1850–1865).

11. See generally Richard Bartlett, Criminal Law Revision Through a Legislative Commission, 18 Buff. L. Rev. 213 (1968–1969); Richard Denzer, Drafting a New Penal Law for New York, 18 Buff. L. Rev. 251 (1968–1969).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 322 2007

3341

5968

the nineteenth century.[12] A typical American criminal code at the time was less a code and more a collection of ad hoc statutory enactments, each enactment triggered by a crime or a crime problem that gained public interest for a time. What passed for a major "reform" in that period was the federal criminal code in 1948 putting the offenses in alphabetical order. Faced with this state of affairs, the American Law Institute's decision to draft a Model Penal Code was an ambitious undertaking.

The American Law Institute (ALI) is a nongovernmental organization of highly regarded judges, lawyers, and law professors in the United States. The institute typically drafts a "restatement" of an area of law, which articulates and rationalizes the governing rules in American jurisdictions. When published, the ALI "Restatement of the Law" for a particular area often becomes persuasive authority for courts and legislatures and commonly is relied upon by courts in interpreting and applying the law.

When the institute undertook its work on criminal law, however, it judged the existing law too chaotic and irrational to merit "restatement." What was needed, the institute concluded, was a model code, which states might use to draft new criminal codes.

The institute's criminal law work was started in 1931, a year after the institute completed a model code of criminal procedure. But the work was stalled during the depression years by lack of adequate funding and later by the events surrounding World War II. It was renewed in 1951 with a grant from a private foundation and proceeded at full speed for more than a decade.

From the beginning, the project bore the imprint of the Chief Reporter, Herbert Wechsler, a law professor at Columbia University who also had participated in the Nuremberg trials of Nazi war criminals.[13] Wechsler assembled a distinguished and remarkably diverse advisory committee of law professors, judges, lawyers, and prison officials, as well as experts from the fields of psychiatry, criminology, and even English literature.[14] In addition, a number of drafting groups tackled various 12. See La. Crim. Code (1942).

13. On Wechsler's approach to criminal law codification, see Herbert Wechsler, The Challenge of a Model Penal Code, 65 Harv. L. Rev. 1097 (1952).

14. Jerome Hall, the leading American criminal law theorist of the time, did not meaningfully participate in the drafting of the code. Cf. Jerome Hall, The Proposal to Prepare a Model Penal Code, 4 J. Legal Stud. 91 (1951); see also Markus D. Dubber, Penal Panopticon: The Idea of a Modern Model Penal Code, 4 Buff. Crim. L. Rev. 53, 63–64 (2000) (discussing Wechsler's rejection of Hall's retributivism).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 323 2007

3342

596

specific topics, such as the treatment of insane offenders or the death penalty. After much debate within the drafting group and the advisory committee, tentative drafts of parts of the code with detailed commentary were presented to and debated by the entire membership of the institute at its annual meetings. This process of annually considering tentative drafts continued until 1962, when the institute finally approved a complete Proposed Official Draft. The original drafters' commentaries contained in the various tentative drafts were consolidated, revised, and finally republished along with the 1962 text as a six-volume set in 1985.[15]

The diversity of its advisory committee indicates the almost Livingstonian scope of the Model Penal Code's ambition. The Model Penal Code is not merely a criminal code, but rather extends to the law governing the infliction of punishment. In fact, the code refers to itself as a "Penal and Correctional Code" or P.C.C., with its first two parts dedicated to substantive criminal law and the other two parts addressing "treatment and correction" and "organization of correction," respectively.[16] No part of the Model Penal Code is explicitly devoted to the remaining aspect of penal law, the law of criminal procedure and evidence. Nonetheless, the code is littered with procedural provisions, including sections that determine the method and propriety of prosecution in particular cases;[17] address the defendant's competency to stand trial;[18] define, assign, and shift the burden of proof;[19] establish evidentiary presumptions;[20] and deal with the appointment of expert witnesses.[21] These provisions complement the ALI's 1930 Model Code of Criminal Procedure. Ten years after the completion of the Model Penal Code, the ALI also published a Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure.

While the Model Penal Code acknowledged the importance of retributional concerns, it commonly gave prominence to more utilitarian 15. Model Penal Code (Official Draft and Revised Comments 1985).

16. Id. § 1.01(1).

17. Id. §§ 1.07-.11, 2.12.

18. Id. § 4.04.

19. Id. §§ 1.12, 2.04(4), 2.08(4), 2.09(1), 2.10, 3.01-.11, 212.4(1), 212.5, 213.6, 221.2(3), 223.1(1), 223.4, 223.9, 230.3, 242.5.

20. Id. §§ 1.03(4), 1.12(5), 5.03(7), 5.06(2) & (3), 5.07, 210.2(b), 211.2, 212.4, 223.6(2), 223.7(1), 223.8, 224.5, 251.2(4), 251.4.

21. Id. § 4.05.

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 324 2007

3343

5970

functions: to deter criminal conduct and, in the event this failed, to diagnose the correctional and incapacitative needs of each offender.[22] The Model Penal Code in this way laid the foundation for the Correctional Code.[23] For example, the Model Penal Code prescribes the same peno-correctional treatment for a person who attempts to commit an offense as for a person who manages to consummate the offense, because both undeterred offenders have displayed the same symptom of dangerousness.[24]

Still, it cannot be said that the Model Penal Code systematically worked out the implications of any particular theory of punishment (or treatment). Adopting an approach that has been characterized as "principled pragmatism,"[25] the code drafters never lost sight of the code's ultimate goal, the reform of American criminal law. Instead of rewriting criminal law in strict consequentialist terms, the code drafters took care to ground the code firmly in existing law and frequently sacrificed theoretical consistency for pragmatic expediency. To continue with the example of attempt, the Model Penal Code carved out an exception for serious offenses, to blunt the otherwise radical impact of its new principle of equal treatment for attempted and consummated offenses.[26] Similarly, the code did not condemn capital punishment, the one sanction that could not fit into its law of "treatment and correction." Instead, it addressed the question in a bracketed section that imposes many serious restrictions on the imposition of capital punishment.[27] Ironically, this conflicted provision later became the foundation for several death penalty statutes and, eventually, the United States Supreme Court's effort to place capital punishment on a constitutional foundation.[28]

---

22. The purposes of the code's various parts are defined in id. § 1.02(1) & (2). See generally Dubber, supra note 14; Robinson, supra note 2, § 1.2.

23. Model Penal Code pts. III & IV (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

24. Model Penal Code § 2.05 cmt. at 293–95 (Official Draft and Revised Comments 1985).

25. Herbert L. Packer, The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 63 Colum. L. Rev. 594 (1963).

26. Model Penal Code § 5.01(1) (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

27. Id. § 210.6.

28. See, e.g., McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183, 202 (1971); Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 158, 190–91, 194 (1976); Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242, 247 (1976); California v. Ramos, 463 U.S. 992, 1009 (1983).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 325 2007

3344

5971

II. THE INFLUENCE OF THE MODEL PENAL CODE

As a pragmatic document, the Model Penal Code enjoyed great success in American legislatures. The code's impact on American criminal law far exceeded that of even the most successful earlier codification project, the Field code. But it was the criminal law portion of the code—the statement of general principles of liability in part I and the definition of specific offenses in part II—that gained historic significance. The sentencing, treatment, and corrections portions, in parts III and IV, saw little acceptance and were soon left behind as American punishment theory and practice moved on to other approaches.

Even before the Model Penal Code was finished, its tentative drafts were used as models for criminal code reform. The two decades following the 1962 promulgation saw a host of state recodifications. New codes were enacted in Illinois, effective in 1962; Minnesota and New Mexico in 1963; New York in 1967; Georgia in 1969; Kansas in 1970; Connecticut in 1971; Colorado and Oregon in 1972; Delaware, Hawaii, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, and Utah in 1973; Montana, Ohio, and Texas in 1974; Florida, Kentucky, North Dakota, and Virginia in 1975; Arkansas, Maine, and Washington in 1976; South Dakota and Indiana in 1977; Arizona and Iowa in 1978; Missouri, Nebraska, and New Jersey in 1979; Alabama and Alaska in 1980; and Wyoming in 1983. All of these thirty-four enactments were influenced in some part by the Model Penal Code. Draft criminal codes produced in other states, such as California, Massachusetts, Michigan, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Vermont, and West Virginia, did not pass legislative review and may yet be revived.

Of the states that have not yet adopted a modern criminal code, the federal system is the most unfortunate example. The U.S. Congress has tried on and off to reform the federal criminal code since 1966, when Congress established a code revision commission at the urging of President Johnson.[29] In 1971, the Brown Commission produced a comprehensive and systematic Proposed New Federal Criminal Code.[30] Later code proposals, built upon the Brown Commission model, were introduced as legislative bills. One of these bills even passed the Senate but died 29. See generally Ronald L. Gainer, Federal Criminal Code Reform: Past and Future, 2 Buff. Crim. L. Rev. 45 (1998).

30. National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws, Final Report: A Proposed New Federal Criminal Code (1971).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 326 2007

3345

597

in the House of Representatives. Criminal code reform is always difficult because it touches highly political issues, but the lack of a modern federal criminal code is considered a matter of some embarrassment among criminal law scholars in the United States. The present federal criminal code is not significantly different in form from the alphabetical listing of offenses that was typical of American codes in the 1800s.

The Model Penal Code's influence has not been confined to the reform of state codes. Thousands of court opinions have cited the Model Penal Code as persuasive authority for the interpretation of an existing statute or in the exercise of a court's occasional power to formulate a criminal law doctrine. (As is well known, while American courts have authority to interpret a code's ambiguous provisions, they generally are bound to follow what they know to be the legislative intention, and bound by interpretation decisions of a higher court.)

Even the Model Penal Code's official commentaries have been influential. Many states have little legislative history available for their courts to use in interpreting a state code provision. Where the state code provision was derived from or influenced by a Model Penal Code provision, the Model Penal Code's commentary often is the best available authority on the reasoning behind the provision and its intended effect.

The code's official commentaries also have become an important research source for criminal law scholars. The commentaries generally give a thoughtful and detailed explanation of the reasoning underlying a code provision as well as the scholarly debates concerning it. Also, because the official commentaries were not published until 1980 (Special Part) and 1985 (General Part), the commentary drafters had available to them information on how each of the Model Penal Code provisions fared during the previous two decades of state criminal code reform. The extent of a code provision's reception or rejection by the states often is detailed in the official commentaries.

The code's provisions for sentencing[31] and treatment[32] have not been influential.[33] They reflect a rehabilitative approach that has since passed out 31. Model Penal Code arts. 6 & 7 (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

32. Id. pts. III & IV.

33. The American Law Institute is currently considering a revision of the code's sentencing provisions. See Symposium, Model Penal Code: Sentencing, 7 Buff. Crim. L. Rev. 1–306 (2003); see also Kevin R. Reitz, American Law Institute, Model Penal Code: Sentencing, Plan for Revision, 6 Buff. Crim. L. Rev. 525 (2003).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 327 2007

3346

5973

of favor. The code has many fewer grading categories than most modern American codes, thereby allowing greater sentencing discretion within each offense grade.[34] Its sentencing system generally relies upon the exercise of broad discretion by judges to individualize an offender's sentence.

In contrast, current American practice is to limit sentencing discretion.[35] That change in approach comes in part from a belief that discretion undercuts the virtues of the legality principle: Discretion increases the likelihood of disparate sentences for similar offenders committing similar offenses.[36] Discretion increases the potential for abuse by a biased decision maker. Discretion undercuts predictability, which is important for both effective deterrence and fair notice. Finally, discretion shifts the criminalization and punishment decisions away from the legislative branch and to the less democratic judicial and executive branches of government.

The code's discretionary sentencing system also is of little current influence in the U.S. because of a change in the underlying theory of liability and punishment.[37] The code's use of discretion was consistent with its interest in using the criminal justice system to promote rehabilitation and to incapacitate dangerous offenders who could not be rehabilitated. With that purpose, the length of an offender's incarceration logically depended upon how the person changed during his criminal commitment. An actual release date could only be determined when an offender appeared to be ready for release.

The limited ability of the social sciences to rehabilitate and to reliably predict future dangerousness has dampened the interest in broad sentencing discretion. This, along with a growing interest in imposing just punishment, has led to less sentencing discretion and more determinate sentences (that is, sentences not subject to early release on parole).

This change in the underlying penal philosophy affected the legislative success not only of the code's sentencing and treatment provisions but also

---

34. See Gerard E. Lynch, Towards a Model Penal Code, Second (Federal?): The Challenge of the Special Part, 2 Buff. Crim. L. Rev. 297 (1998).

35. See, for example, the (once) mandatory sentencing guidelines for federal courts, United States Sentencing Guidelines Manual (2005). The future of determinate guideline sentencing in the United States, however, recently has been thrown into doubt. See United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005) (federal sentencing guidelines merely advisory).

36. See, e.g., Marvin E. Frankel, Criminal Sentences: Law Without Order (1973).

37. See, e.g., Andrew von Hirsch, Doing Justice: The Choice of Punishments (1976); Francis A. Allen, The Decline of the Rehabilitative Ideal: Penal Policy and Social Purpose (1981); Herbert Morris, Persons and Punishment, 52 Monist 475 (1968).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 328 2007

3347

5974

of some of its liability and grading provisions. For example, few states have followed the code's abandonment of the common law distinction between the punishment for attempted and consummated offenses. The code's policy makes good sense if one's focus is on rehabilitation and incapacitation of the dangerous—an offender may be equally dangerous whether or not his conduct in fact causes the harm intended or risked. On the other hand, if the criminal law is to capture the community's sense of justice, then the community's shared intuition that resulting harm does matter cannot be ignored.[38]

The code's Special Part also has become dated in some areas, such as in its treatment of sexual offenses and drug offenses. American society's views on many sexual and gender issues have changed since the code was drafted in the 1950s. Modern American codes typically adopt a gender-neutral approach to defining sexual offenses, give greater expression to the concern for victims of sexual offenses, and reflect a greater sensitivity to the history of sexual victimization of women by men. For instance, beginning in the 1980s, states began to reject the marital immunity for rape, which the Model Penal Code had retained from the common law. At the same time, drug offenses now figure among the most serious offenses defined in American criminal codes. In 1962 the Model Penal Code included no drug offenses. In an appendix to the code's Special Part, the drafters merely remarked that "a State enacting a new Penal Code may insert additional Articles dealing with special topics such as narcotics, alcoholic beverages, gambling and offenses against tax and trade laws."[39]

III. THE INNOVATIONS OF THE MODEL PENAL CODE

To appreciate the Model Penal Code's contribution to criminal law codification in the United States, it is important to recall the embryonic state of the subject at the outset of the Model Penal Code project in the early 1950s. The then most recent codification effort was that of the 1948 reform

38. Paul H. Robinson & John M. Darley, Justice, Liability, and Blame: Community Views and the Criminal Law (1995); Paul H. Robinson, Competing Conceptions of Modern Desert: Vengeful, Deontological & Empirical (forthcoming 2007); Paul H. Robinson & John M. Darley, Intuitions of Justice: Implications for Criminal Law and Justice Policy (forthcoming 2007).

39. Model Penal Code app. (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 329 2007

3348

of the federal criminal code, an alphabetical ordering of federal crimes for which, according to a contemporary observer, "the spadework was done by the hired hands of three commercial law-book publishers, on delegation from a congressional committee desirous of escaping the responsibility of hiring and supervising its own staff."[40]

As a result, the Model Penal Code drafters had virtually no existing American criminal codes to which to turn, with the possible exception of the recently reformed criminal code of Louisiana. That code, however, could have only limited significance for a Model Penal Code of American criminal law because of the unique history and nature of Louisiana law, which alone among the states was rooted not in uncodified English common law, but in codified European civil law. Much of what the Model Penal Code introduced into the United States has long been common practice in European codes. But while the code's structure generally resembles that of many European codes, the extent to which these foreign codes more directly influenced the Model Penal Code is unclear. The strongest foreign influence on the code came in the person of Glanville Williams, a British criminal law expert on the uncodified English common law.

A. A Comprehensive General Part

The Model Penal Code drafters created a "General Part" that contains a set of general principles applicable to each of the specific offenses contained in the "Special Part" of the code. The general principles include such matters as general principles for imposing liability, general principles of defense, general inchoate offenses, etc. Such a structure, hardly revolutianry by European standards, provides greater clarity and sophistication while simultaneously simplifying the code. Instead of having to repeat the rules governing complicity, omission liability, culpability requirements, or available defenses, for example, in each offense (or leaving them to the courts to define), the rules can be stated once in detailed form in the General Part, to be referred to in the prosecution of any offense in the Special Part.

The current federal criminal "code" is typical of what existed in the states before the Model Penal Code. It has essentially no General Part. (The term "code" may suggest a document of greater coherence and planning than is present in the current federal "code," so it may be better 40. Henry M. Hart, Jr. The Aims of the Criminal Law, 23 Law & Contemp. Probs. 401, 432 n.70 (1958).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 330 2007

5976

to refer simply to "Title 18 of the United States Code"). Title 18's chapter 1, grandly titled "General Provisions," includes a less-than-helpful definition of complicity, an insanity defense, and a few definitions. Thus, 99 percent of the General Part remains uncodified in federal law, thereby delegating criminal-law making authority to the federal judiciary.

B. An Analytic Structure

The Model Penal Code, like most successful criminal codes, implicitly provides an analytic structure that gives judges, lawyers, and jurors a decisional process for assessing criminal liability.[41] Its three-part structure might be summarized with these questions:

First, does the actor's conduct constitute a crime? The code defines the contours of the law's prohibitions (and, where duties to act are created, the law's commands). This is the issue most familiar to laypersons and most prominent in older criminal codes. It is the sole subject of the code's entire Special Part.

Second, even if the actor's conduct does constitute a crime, are there special reasons why that conduct ought not to be considered wrongful in this instance, under these facts? Article 3 of the Model Penal Code answers this question through the use of justification defenses. These defenses concede the violation of a prohibitory norm, but offer a countervailing justificatory norm that undercuts the propriety of liability on the special facts of the current situation.

Finally, even if the actor's conduct is a crime and is wrongful (unjustified), should the actor be held blameworthy for it? Is he or she deserving of criminal liability and punishment? This question is answered primarily by the excuse defenses and culpability requirements in articles 2 and 4 of the code. For example, wrongful conduct by an actor who is at the time insane or under duress or involuntarily intoxicated may not be sufficiently blameworthy to merit the condemnation of criminal conviction.

C. Defining Offenses Fully, Using Defined Terms

The Model Penal Code drafters understood that an undefined term invites judicial lawmaking in the same way as an absent or partial provision, and 41. See Dubber, supra note 2, §§ 3, 18; Paul H. Robinson, Structure & Function in Criminal Law pt. II (1997). For a functional analysis of the code's structure, see id. pt. III.

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 331 2007

3350

5977

can as effectively undercut the goals of the legality principle. Every code will inevitably contain ambiguous language that must be interpreted by judges. A drafter's obligation, they believed, is to reserve that delegation of judicial authority to the instances in which it is not reasonably avoidable. Code terms that might reasonably be given different definitions by different readers ought to be defined.

With this view, the Model Penal Code drafters did much to fully define offenses and to define the terms they used in defining offenses; the code explicitly rejects common law offenses and bars judicial creation of offenses.[42] In addition, the code's General Part includes definitions of commonly used terms that will then have the same meaning in every provision of the code. Defined terms also are contained at the beginning of many articles in the Special Part.

Compared to many European criminal codes, the Model Penal Code covers more topics in greater detail. As a result, the code occasionally reads more like a criminal law textbook than a code. Its comprehensiveness and detail reflect the scope and nature of the code's reform ambition. Topics can be left for judicial or scholarly interpretation only in the presence of a highly sophisticated judiciary and academic community. At the time of the code project, the criminal law in the United States met neither of these conditions. The code, after all, was specifically designed to wrest the criminal law out of the hands of the judiciary which, after centuries of common-law making, had left the criminal law an unprincipled mess.

D. A System for the Interpretation of Code Provisions

The Model Penal Code drafters' concern for advancing legality interests also showed in their creation of a system for the interpretation of the code's provisions. Such guidance in the exercise of judicial discretion increases the law's predictability and reduces both disparity in application and the potential for abuse of discretion.

The statutory principles of interpretation also are designed to advance the goals for which criminal liability and punishment are imposed. Model Penal Code section 1.02 directs judges to interpret ambiguous provisions

42. Model Penal Code § 1.05 (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 332 2007

3351

5978

to further the code's purposes.[43] While such a provision has its shortcomings (it gives no guidance on what to do when different purposes conflict, as frequently occurs), it is an important first step toward rationality in code drafting, for it offers a formal statement of what the code is meant to achieve.

E. A System of Offenses

Rather than a collection of offenses, where each offense is an independent creature, often the result of a political campaign prompted by a particular crime or event, the Model Penal Code adopts a system of offenses, in which offenses are designed to work together as a complementary group. Offenses typically avoid both gaps and overlaps in coverage. By considering all offenses together, the legislature can better insure that the penalties associated with each offense properly reflect the relative seriousness of that offense in relation to other offenses.

Part of this systematic approach to creating and defining offenses is to organize offenses conceptually—offenses against the person, offenses against property, etc.—and within each general group to organize offenses into related subcategories.[44] Offenses against the person, for example, are organized into four articles: homicide (§ 210); assault, endangerment, and threats (§ 211); kidnapping and related offenses (§ 212); and sexual offenses (§ 213). Such conceptual grouping makes it easier to see, and to avoid, overlaps among offenses and unwarranted grading disparities. It also makes it easier for a code user to find the relevant offense. And, when the relevant offense is found, such grouping insures the user that related offenses are nearby, not hidden in a dark corner elsewhere in the code.

---

43. The code's purposes are:

> (a) to forbid and prevent conduct that unjustifiably and inexcusably inflicts or threatens substantial harm to individual or public interests; (b) to subject to public control persons whose conduct indicates that they are disposed to commit crimes; (c) to safeguard conduct that is without fault from condemnation as criminal; (d) to give fair warning of the nature of the conduct declared to constitute an offense; (e) to differentiate on reasonable grounds between serious and minor offenses.

Model Penal Code § 1.02(1)(a)-(e) (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

44. For a comparative discussion of the code's notion of "individual or public interests" and the concept of Rechtsgut in German criminal law, see Markus D. Dubber, Theories of Crime and Punishment in German Criminal Law, 53 Am. J. Comp. L. 679 (2006).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 333 2007

3352

5979

F. Innovations in Specific Criminal Law Doctrines

In substance, the Model Penal Code is based on the American criminal law at the time it was drafted. For the vast majority of issues in the general and special part of criminal law, this law was judge-made common law. If the code drafters ventured beyond the confines of American criminal law, they consulted English common law jurisprudence, particularly as interpreted by Glanville Williams, whose extended project to rationalize English criminal law coincided with Herbert Wechsler's attempt to rationalize American criminal law through the Model Penal Code.[45]

Many of the Model Penal Code's substantive innovations already were laid out in Wechsler's monumental 1937 article, "A Rationale of the Law of Homicide."[46] There Wechsler, and his Columbia colleague Jerome Michael, subjected American criminal law to a detailed critique, using the law of homicide as an illustration. The Model Penal Code thus arose from a painstaking critique of positive law, rather than from a systematic theory of criminal liability. Wechsler was no theoretician. As a major figure in the American legal process school, Wechsler saw the problems of substantive criminal law as problems of policy. The criminal law, and therefore the Model Penal Code, was a means to achieve a policy end.[47]

1. Offense Elements

The Model Penal Code set out to simplify and rationalize the hodgepodge of common law offense definitions in two ways.[48] First, it adopted an approach that has been called "element analysis," which carefully distinguished between the various elements of an offense, including conduct, attendant circumstances, and its result. Second, it recognized and defined only four mental states: purpose, knowledge, recklessness, and negligence. Each objective element of a given offense in the code can have attached to it a different mental state.

---

45. See Glanville Williams, Criminal Law: The General Part (1st ed. 1953; 2d ed. 1962).

46. Jerome Michael & Herbert Wechsler, A Rationale of the Law of Homicide I & II, 37 Colum. L. Rev. 701, 1261 (1937).

47. That end, however, in Wechsler's opinion, recently had been scientifically settled once and for all in favor of a deterrent-rehabilitative approach. See id. at 732 n.126.

48. Paul H. Robinson & Jane A. Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability, 35 Stan. L. Rev. 681 (1983); Robinson, supra note 41, ch. 3.

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 334 2007

3353

5980

The first innovation was designed to eliminate the common law's confusion about the so-called mens rea of a given offense. This confusion, the code drafters believed, often resulted from the inability of the common law to distinguish between different elements of an offense, each of which may require a different mental state for conviction.

Standing alone, the differentiation of various offense elements, coupled with the novel requirement that each element, rather than merely each offense, carry a mental state, might have complicated rather than simplified the law. The second innovation addressed this problem by replacing the dozens of mental states that had emerged over the course of the common law with merely four.

This radical change in the law of mens rea, one of the core principles of the common law, drew little criticism from commentators and proved remarkably popular among state legislatures.[49] In fact, the Model Penal Code's definitions of these four mental states may be the code's most important contribution to American criminal law reform. These definitions strove to simplify not only by radically reducing the number of mental states, but also by reducing (but not eliminating) reliance upon normative judgments. Talk of "malice aforethought" and even "premeditation" were replaced by presumably testable phenomena such as "conscious object" or "knowledge." In its zeal to clarify the law, the Model Penal Code even excised the words "intent" and "intention" from its terminology, concepts that in spite (or perhaps partly because) of their ambiguity had assumed a central place in the criminal law of the United States, as well as of many other countries.[50]

On the subject of so-called strict or absolute liability offenses, i.e., offenses whose elements do not all require a culpability state, the Model Penal Code struck a characteristically pragmatic compromise. Instead of eliminating such offenses altogether, it limited their common use to two offense categories, "civil offenses" defined in the criminal code as "violations," punishable only by fine, forfeiture, or other civil penalty, and "offenses defined by statutes other than the code, insofar as a legislative purpose to impose absolute liability for such offenses or with respect to

49. But see Jerome Hall, Negligent Behavior Should Be Excluded from Penal Liability, 63 Colum. L. Rev. 632 (1963).

50. But cf. N.Y. Penal Law § 15.05(1) (2006) (retaining mental state of "intentional," but redefining it in terms of "conscious objective").

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 335 2007

3354

5981

any material element thereof plainly appears."[51] The Model Penal Code does not prohibit strict liability in the code's offenses, but does create a presumption against interpreting the absence of a culpability element as strict liability. Instead, a requirement of recklessness is read into an offense that contains no specific culpable state of mind requirement.[52]

In the particular case of felony murder, a serious strict liability offense under the common law whose definition required no mental state with respect to the act of homicide, the Model Penal Code transformed the definitional question into an evidentiary one. Instead of eliminating the requirement of a mental state with respect to the homicidal act, as the common law had done, the code instead established a rebuttable presumption that the perpetrator of an underlying felony in fact had the mental state with respect to the killing that would constitute murder (recklessness manifesting an extreme indifference to the value of human life).[53]

2. Inchoate and Accomplice Liability

The Model Penal Code's abandonment of the common law distinction between inchoate and consummated offenses already has been mentioned.[54] This decision was both the most doctrinaire and the least successful by the code drafters. Punishing inchoate offenses as harshly as consummated ones appears particularly harsh against the background of the wide sweep of inchoate offenses under the code. By defining all inchoate offenses in its General Part, the code cemented the common law's broad approach to preparatory offenses. Every crime, including the pettiest misdemeanor, was criminalized in its inchoate form, whether as an attempt, a solicitation, or as a conspiracy. Still, the Model Penal Code did bar the conviction of, though not the prosecution for, both the inchoate and the consummated form of an offense.[55] The code thereby rejected the most expansive theory of inchoate offenses under the common law, still espoused at the time by federal criminal law, which had permitted separate punishments for the preparation and consummation

51. Model Penal Code § 2.05 (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

52. Id. § 2.02(3).

53. Id. § 210.2(1)(b).

54. See generally Herbert Wechsler et al., The Treatment of Inchoate Crimes in the Model Penal Code I & II, 61 Colum. L. Rev. 571, 957 (1961).

55. Model Penal Code § 1.07(1)(b) (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 336 2007

3355

5982

of the same offense.[56] The code also prohibits multiple convictions "of more than one [inchoate] offense . . . for conduct designed to commit or to culminate in the commission of the same crime."[57]

The Model Penal Code draws a sharp theoretical distinction between inchoate offenses and complicity, which was defined as the attribution of the principal's criminal conduct to another.[58] The distinction was of less practical significance, however, as the code abandoned not only the distinction between the punishment for preparatory and consummated offenses, but also that between the punishment of principals and accessories. In fact, the code discarded the common law distinctions between first- and second-degree principals, on the one hand, and accessories before and after the fact, on the other, in favor of a single distinction between principal and accomplice, both of whom were then subjected to the same punishment.[59]

Only after an intervention by Judge Learned Hand, one of America's most prominent judges, did the American Law Institute reject the drafters' proposal to extend accomplice liability, and therefore full punishment as a principal, to a person who was merely aware of his contribution to the principal's criminal act.[60] The code instead requires that the accomplice act "with the purpose of promoting or facilitating the commission of the offense."[61] As a compromise, some states have adopted general facilitation provisions that criminalize aiding another's criminal conduct knowingly or merely "believing it probable" that one is rendering aid.[62]

3. Justification Defenses

The code for the first time recognized a general defense of necessity, or lesser evils. This defense is available where particular justification defenses, such as self-defense, defense of property, or law enforcement authority, 56. See, e.g., Callanan v. United States, 364 U.S. 587 (1961).

57. Model Penal Code § 5.05(3) (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

58. See id. § 2.06.

59. On the common law of complicity, see Francis Bowes Sayre, Criminal Responsibility for the Acts of Another, 43 Harv. L. Rev. 689 (1930).

60. Model Penal Code § 2.06 cmt. at 313-19 (Official Draft and Revised Comments 1985).

61. Model Penal Code § 2.06(3)(a) (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

62. N.Y. Penal Law § 115.00 (2006).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 337 2007

3356

5983

are not. The defense applies to conduct the actor believes to be "necessary to avoid a harm or evil to himself or another," provided that "the harm or evil sought to be avoided by such conduct is greater than that sought to be prevented by the law defining the offense charged."[63] The broad scope of this provision is best illustrated by the cases enumerated in the official code commentary:

> Under this section, property may be destroyed to prevent the spread of a fire. A speed limit may be violated in pursuing a suspected criminal. An ambulance may pass a traffic light. Mountain climbers lost in a storm may take refuge in a house or may appropriate provisions. Cargo may be jettisoned or an embargo violated to preserve the vessel. An alien may violate a curfew in order to reach an air raid shelter. A druggist may dispense a drug without the requisite prescription to alleviate grave distress in an emergency.[64]

The lesser evils defense does not affect the actor's civil liability and is a so-called affirmative defense. To successfully invoke an affirmative defense, the defendant must produce supporting evidence before the burden of proof shifts to the prosecution, which must then disprove the defense beyond a reasonable doubt.[65] The code frequently relies on this procedural mechanism to resolve difficult issues of substantive criminal law.[66]

4. Excuse Defenses

The Model Penal Code drafters devoted almost an entire article to the problem of legal insanity. Except for its final section, which sets the age of maturity for purposes of criminal liability at sixteen,[67] article 4 deals in great detail with the full panoply of substantive and procedural issues surrounding the defense of insanity, including such procedural questions as the defendant's competency to stand trial, the assignment of the burden of proof, the requirement of notice that an insanity defense will be offered, the form of the verdict and judgment, the appointment and selection of

63. Model Penal Code § 3.02(1) (Proposed Official Draft 1962).
64. Model Penal Code § 1.01 cmt. at 9–10 (Official Draft and Revised Comments 1985).
65. Model Penal Code §§ 1.12, 3.01 (Proposed Official Draft 1962).
66. See sections cited supra note 10.
67. Model Penal Code § 4.10 (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 338 2007

3357

5984

psychiatric experts, the admissibility of statements made during the examination, the form of the psychiatrist's report, the hearing on the question of insanity or competency, and the commitment following an acquittal on the basis of insanity.

The Model Penal Code's extensive coverage of mental illness reflects the conflicts surrounding this issue during the decade of the code's drafting. The advisory committee included several members of the "Group for the Advancement of Psychiatry," whose members were determined to radically reform the criminal law in the name of the science of psychiatry. In 1954, three years into the code project, the federal appellate court for the District of Columbia, in the famous Durham case,[68] replaced the so-called right-wrong test of insanity derived from the 1843 English case of M'Naghten[69] with a test designed to reflect advances in the field of psychiatry as well as to soften the perceived harshness of the M'Naghten rule.

Characteristically, the Model Penal Code once again struck a compromise by retaining but softening the M'Naghten test while assigning psychiatric experts a central role in the test's interpretation and application. The M'Naghten rule in its original formulation required that, "at the time of the committing of the act, the party accused was laboring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing; or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong." The Model Penal Code extended the defense to an actor who "lacks substantial capacity . . . to appreciate the criminality of his conduct."[70] In addition, the Model Penal Code made the defense available even to an actor who did not qualify under this cognitive prong, as long as he lacked "substantial" volitional capacity "to conform his conduct to the requirements of law."[71]

The Model Penal Code's insanity test proved popular in many American jurisdictions, including the District of Columbia after the abandonment of its Durham rule in 1972.[72] Following John Hinckley's acquittal

68. Durham v. United States, 214 F.2d 862 (D.C. Cir. 1954). The Durham test was deceptively simple: "an accused is not criminally responsible if his unlawful act was the product of mental disease or mental defect." For later complications and the eventual demise of Durham, see United States v. Brawner, 471 F.2d 969 (1972) (en banc)

69. M'Naghten's Case, 1 C. & K. 130; 4 St. Tr. N.S. 847 (1843).

70. Model Penal Code § 4.01 (Proposed Official Draft 1962).

71. Id. § 4.01.

72. United States v. Brawner, 471 F.2d 969 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (en banc).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 339 2007

3358

5985

under the volitional prong of the Model Penal Code's test for his assassination attempt on President Reagan in 1981, however, many states and the federal government restricted the defense of insanity by removing the volitional prong.[73]

5. Special Part

Most of the Model Penal Code's specific doctrinal innovations appeared in its General Part. The most important innovation in the Special Part was its revision of the law of homicide. The code's homicide article provides the best illustration of its new system of mental states.[74] In this article, the code drafters replaced the common law's multitude of homicide offenses with a single offense—"purposely, knowingly, recklessly or negligently caus[ing] the death of another human being"—with three defined grades. Murder, manslaughter, and negligent homicide thus differed primarily in their mental state, the first requiring purpose or knowledge, the second recklessness, and the third negligence.

The code's partial rejection of the felony murder rule already has been discussed. The common law defense of provocation was retained, though not without being transformed into the more general defense of "extreme mental or emotional disturbance."[75] The code made no attempt to connect this defense to other more general excuse defenses in its General Part. It therefore survives as a defense available only in homicide cases.

CONCLUSION

For almost half a century, the Model Penal Code has been the dominant force in American criminal code reform and a catalyst for American criminal law scholarship. In general, the Model Penal Code has stood the test of time. While individual provisions of the code, such as its definition of insanity and its grading of inchoate offenses, have been amended for one reason or another, no state has seen fit to undertake a wholesale reform of its criminal code away from the Model Penal Code. Even academic 73. See, e.g., Clark v. Arizona, 126 S. Ct. 2709 (2006).

74. Model Penal Code art. 210 (Proposed Official Draft 1962).
75. Id. § 210.3(1)(b).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 340 2007

3359

5986

commentary generally has come to focus on the code, albeit not always agreeing with it.[76]

Nonetheless, the code is showing its age as the theory and practice of American criminal law has long since rejected the code's emphasis on deterrence and rehabilitation and as attitudes toward criminalization have shifted. A reform of the model therefore is much needed. When that reform comes, however, there can be little doubt that it will build upon the foundations laid down in the Model Penal Code.

76. For collections of code commentary during its first twenty years, see Symposium, The Model Penal Code, 63 Colum. L. Rev. 589 (1963), and Symposium, The 25th Anniversary of the Model Penal Code, 19 Rutgers L.J. 519 (1988). For a more recent critical exchange regarding the Model Code, see George P. Fletcher, Dogmas of the Model Penal Code, 2 Buff. Crim. L. Rev. 3 (1998), and Paul H. Robinson, In Defense of the Model Penal Code: A Reply to Professor Fletcher, 2 Buff. Crim. L. Rev. 25 (1998).

HeinOnline -- 10 New Crim. L. Rev. 341 2007

3360

5987

MAKE A DONATION TO AMNESTY BEFORE SEPTEMBER 30 AND YOUR GIFT WILL BE DOUBLED * Up to $200,000 DONATE NOW »

MEMBER CENTER | FIND RESOURCES SEARCH AMNESTY

NEWS EVENTS BLOG RESEARCH STORE

OUR WORK GET INVOLVED DONATE ABOUT US

Afghanistan

OUR WORK

ISSUES

CAMPAIGNS

COUNTRIES

Africa ›

Americas ›

Asia and the Pacific ›

- Afghanistan
- Australia
- Bangladesh
- Bhutan
- Brunei Darussalam
- Cambodia
- China
- Fiji
- India
- Indonesia
- Japan
- Laos
- Malaysia
- Maldives
- Mongolia
- Myanmar
- Nepal
- New Zealand
- North Korea
- Pakistan
- Papua New Guinea
- Philippines
- Singapore
- Solomon Islands
- South Korea
- Sri Lanka
- Taiwan
- Thailand
- Timor-Leste
- Vanuatu
- Viet Nam

Europe ›

Middle East and North Africa ›

Home › Our Work › Countries › Asia and the Pacific › Afghanistan

Like 43

Afghanistan Human Rights

Human Rights Concerns

The Islamic Republic of Afghanistan is home to 28.2 million people, a number which includes hundreds of thousands of refugees from various neighboring countries. The life expectancy is 42.9 years, under 5-mortality for both male and females is 223/237 per 1,000 and adult literacy is 28 per cent. Millions of people living in southern and eastern Afghanistan are terrorized by the Taleban, other insurgent groups, and local militias ostensibly allied with the government. People continue to suffer insecurity that further restricts their limited access to food, health care and schooling. While access to education has greatly improved since the years of Taleban rule and is now open to girls, many boys and girls still aren't in school. Education however continues to shine a beacon of hope for many Afghans who would like to see their country move toward a more democratic and peaceful place to live.

MORE INFO

GET INVOLVED

Read More: Afghanistan: Don't Trade Away Women's Human Rights

Learn More: The Plight of Afghan Women: A Disturbing Picture (Time)

AFGHANISTAN HUMAN RIGHTS UPDATES

U.S. Releases Its First-Ever Strategy to End Violence Against Women Globally

The U.S. government has just released its much anticipated global strategy to prevent and address gender-based violence.

LEARN MORE VIEW ALL

NEWS

Afghanistan: 100 lashes for teen shows why climate of violence against women must be tackled

The public flogging of a 16-year-old girl by a local mullah in Afghanistan is abhorrent and testifies to the precarious situation of women and girls in Afghanistan.

LEARN MORE VIEW ALL

VICTORY

Great News! Journalist Freed!

Afghan journalist Nasto Naderi was released on bail on 8 May after being detained for broadcasting material criticizing the mayor of Kabul without proof.

Get updates on Amnesty's work to protect human rights in Asia.

YOUR EMAIL ADDRESS

Women's Human Rights are Non-Negotiable in Afghanistan

Amnesty International urges the U.S. government to uphold its commitment to Afghan women.

TAKE ACTION

VIEW ALL ACTIONS

Support human rights in Asia and worldwide with a donation to Amnesty today.

DONATE NOW

VIDEO SPOTLIGHT

Amnesty's Shadow Summit for Afghan Women's Rights

VIEW ALL VIDEOS

FEATURE

3361

5988

CASES

VICTORIES

LEARN MORE VIEW ALL

REPORT

USA: 'Targeted killing' policies violate the right to life

Amnesty International calls on all states to refrain from the unlawful use of lethal force, including against individuals suspected of terrorism, and to cooperate, bilaterally and through intergove...

LEARN MORE VIEW ALL

Violence Against Afghan Women on Rise

Acid attacks, public executions for "adultery" -- these horrific assaults require an urgent plan of action to protect women in Afghanistan.

READ MORE

RELATED ISSUES AND CAMPAIGNS

Death Penalty

Amnesty International opposes the death penalty in all cases without exception regardless of the nature of the crime, the charactenstics of the offender, or the method used.

LEARN MORE

Arms Trade

To protect human rights, governments must prevent easy access to arms, and strictly regulate their lawful uses.

LEARN MORE

Women's Rights

Living free from violence is a human right. Yet millions of women and girls around the world encounter rape, domestic abuse, mutilation and other forms of gender-based violence.

LEARN MORE

RESEARCH SPOTLIGHT

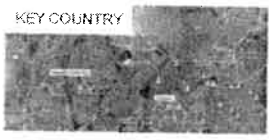
The Toxic Truth

Amnesty and Greenpeace join up to expose the environmental and human rights disaster of toxic waste dumping in Cote d'Ivoire.

READ MORE

VIEW ALL REPORTS

KEY COUNTRY



Eyes on Aleppo, Syria

Amnesty releases new satellite images from Aleppo, Syria, showing increased use of heavy weapons near civilian areas.

LEARN MORE

VIEW ALL COUNTRIES

MUSIC FOR AMNESTY

Chimes of Freedom

All profits from Chimes of Freedom, a 4-CD album featuring 76 newly recorded Bob Dylan songs, benefit Amnesty International's human rights work.

LISTEN NOW

SHOP AMNESTY

FEATURED ACTION

Free Pussy Riot

Send your urgent message to Russian authorities now to stop the criminal persecution of Pussy Riot and protect free expression!

TAKE ACTION

VIEW ALL ACTIONS

© 2012 Amnesty International USA | 5 Penn Plaza, New York, NY 10001 | 212.807.8400

5989

ALJAZEERA

Yemen denies warplane shot down

Army official denies claim by fighters that they brought down MiG fighter in Saada.

Last Modified: 02 Oct 2009 11:38 GMT

The United Nations estimates that 55,000 people have fled their homes because of the conflict [AFP]

A senior Yemeni military official has denied a claim that rebel Houthi fighters have shot down a MiG 21 warplane which was raiding their strongholds in the northern region of Saada.

State media quoted the official as saying the plane ran into a mountain peak because of a technical fault.

The fighters, from the Zaidi sect of Shia Islam, said in a statement that the jet was downed "this morning in the Shaaf area of Saada province, while it was bombing civilians in villages and markets".

Contradicting state media, another Yemeni military commander told the AFP news agency that the aircraft had been "flying at low attitude" when it was hit.

Mohammed Abdel Salam, a Houthi spokesman, identified the pilot as Lieutenant Shamsan Mohammed Abdu Meflih.

'Scorched Earth' campaign

Troops continue to press their seven-week-old offensive against the Houthis in the northern mountains, with no sign of the conflict ending.

Five fighters and four soldiers are reported to have been killed in fighting in the Harf Sufyan district of Amran province, on the road linking the capital Sanaa with Saada, the centre of the region of the same name which borders Saudi Arabia.

On Wednesday, 28 fighters were also killed in clashes near Saada.

The army launched operation "Scorched Earth" on August 11 in an attempt to finally crush an uprising in which thousands of people have been killed since it first broke out in 2004.

The United Nations estimates that 55,000 people have fled their homes because of the conflict.

The authorities accuse the Houthi fighters of seeking to restore the Zaidi Shia imamate that was overthrown in a republican coup in 1962, triggering an eight-year civil war.

The fighters deny the charge and say they are fighting to defend their community against government aggression and marginalisation.

A minority in mainly Sunni Yemen, the Zaidis are the majority community in the north.

Source: Agencies

3363

Libya: Protect Civilians in Sirte Fighting [1]

Ensure Humane Treatment of Prisoners

October 12, 2011

(New York) – Forces on both sides fighting in the Libyan city of Sirte should minimize harm to civilians and treat all prisoners humanely, Human Rights Watch said today. Fighters aligned with the National Transitional Council (NTC) have reached the center of the city, after attacking Sirte for more than three weeks.

NTC-aligned forces that capture pro-Gaddafi fighters and civilians suspected of actively supporting Gaddafi forces should promptly transfer their detainees to NTC facilities in Tripoli or Benghazi to minimize the danger of abuse from forces that were engaged in combat, Human Rights Watch said.

"Commanders on the ground in Sirte need to make sure that their forces protect civilians and allow them to flee the combat zone," said Fred Abrahams [2], special advisor at Human Rights Watch. "All prisoners should be treated humanely and transferred to the NTC authorities who can better ensure their safety."

The NTC political leadership has repeatedly called on fighters not to loot or commit revenge attacks, but forces on the ground do not always heed those calls, Human Rights Watch said.

Since mid-September 2011, various NTC-aligned forces have attacked Sirte, Muammar Gaddafi's hometown and one of two places still held by pro-Gaddafi forces. NATO warplanes have repeatedly attacked targets inside the city, in apparent coordination with allied forces on the ground.

NTC field commanders said on October 9 that they had seized Sirte's Ouagadougou conference center, Ibn Sina hospital, and Sirte University. But intense fighting continues in the city center.

Many of Sirte's pre-war population of roughly 100,000 have fled, but an unknown number of civilians remain in the city's center. According to the International Committee of the Red Cross [3], which evacuated 25 war-wounded and other patients from Ibn Sina Hospital on October 10 and 11, more than 20,000 people have left their homes so far, but "thousands" of civilians are still caught in the city. On October 11, hundreds of civilians fled the city during a lull in fighting, including residents and migrant workers, media reported.

All parties to the armed conflict in Libya are required to abide by the laws of war. People who commit serious laws-of-war violations deliberately or recklessly are subject to prosecution for war crimes, including by domestic courts or the International Criminal Court, which has jurisdiction for international crimes committed in Libya since February 15.

The laws of war require that all persons in custody be treated humanely, and be protected from torture or other ill-treatment. Looting and destruction of property not being used for military purposes is prohibited.

Human Rights Watch expressed particular concern that fighters and civilians from the town of Tawerga who are now in Sirte are especially vulnerable to abuse. The NTC-aligned forces attacking Sirte include people from Misrata, who allege that Tawerga residents were part of the Gaddafi forces who committed atrocities in Misrata. In early October, Human Rights Watch documented abuses, including torture, in and around Misrata by Misrata fighters against people from Tawerga.

Fighters from Misrata have also reportedly been looting private property in Abu Hadi, a suburb of Sirte. They have reportedly burned the homes of families suspected of supporting Gaddafi.

Between September 24 and October 8, 2011, Human Rights Watch interviewed 28 families who had recently fled Sirte. They described fierce fighting, a lack of electricity since late August, and dangerously low supplies of food and medicine.

Fleeing residents said that NTC-aligned forces had repeatedly shelled some residential neighborhoods over the past two weeks. The residents had mostly huddled in their homes for safety during the attacks and were unable to say where pro-Gaddafi forces were positioned at the time.

Three families said shells from NTC-aligned forces in the south and west had hit their homes. One family said its home was hit by a NATO airstrike. No civilian casualties resulted from these attacks, the families said. Without access to Sirte, Human Rights Watch could not verify the claims.

The laws of war require warring forces to attack only military targets. Attacks that do not discriminate between combatants and civilians, or that can be expected to cause harm to civilians disproportionate to the expected military gain, are unlawful. Forces must take all feasible steps to protect civilians under their control from attacks and avoid deploying in densely populated areas.

Two Sirte residents said they had seen Grad rockets strike the city from areas controlled by NTC-aligned fighters, but this could not be confirmed. News media outside Sirte have reported that Gaddafi forces also fired Grads from inside the city.

Grad rockets, with a range of 4 to 40 kilometers, have no guidance system and are inherently indiscriminate when fired into populated areas. When fired in groups, they have an impact over a wide area and can inflict extensive casualties in civilian-inhabited areas.

"Indiscriminate Grad rockets should not be fired into Sirte so long as civilians inhabit the city," Abrahams said.

While some families reported no problems leaving Sirte, others alleged that Gaddafi forces had tried to block their exit from the city by firing at them or above their vehicles. These families said they took circuitous routes to escape, sometimes through agricultural fields. Deliberate attacks on civilians are war crimes, Human Rights Watch said.

Several families said that NATO bombing had caused civilian casualties. One displaced resident said that around September 22 at 10 p.m., NATO struck the Imartameen building on Dubai Street, killing and wounding a large number of residents. At the time of the attack, about 10 pro-Gaddafi snipers were positioned on the roof, the resident said. The man said he was part of the crew who spent two days using heavy equipment to remove the bodies. Among the dead, he said, was Sadik Abuazoum, 43, a secondary school teacher, and Sadik's wife.

If snipers were deployed on the roof, that would have made the building a legitimate military target, Human Rights Watch said. It would raise concerns over whether pro-Gaddafi forces had taken all feasible steps to remove civilians from the building and whether NATO conducted an attack that caused disproportionate civilian harm.

Several fleeing residents said that NATO bombs had struck schools. One resident identified those schools as Ibn Khaldoun, Al-Merkezia, Al-Bayan al-Awal, and Al-Majed. He and the others knew of no civilian casualties in those attacks. It is not known whether Gaddafi forces were using the schools at the time, which would have made them military targets.

In addition to Sirte, pro-Gaddafi forces still hold the desert town of Bani Walid, about 120 kilometers southeast of Tripoli.

"The forces fighting the last Gaddafi areas should protect civilians caught in the fighting, and avoid looting and revenge," Abrahams said.

Source URL: http://www.hrw.org/news/2011/10/12/libya-protect-civilians-sirte-fighting

Links:

[1] http://www.hrw.org/news/2011/10/12/libya-protect-civilians-sirte-fighting

[2] https://mail.hrw.org/owa/redir.aspx?
C=c1e56d4841ee498894ce700e6122ba69&URL=http%3a%2f%2fwww.hrw.org%2fbios%2ffred-abrahams

[3] https://mail.hrw.org/owa/redir.aspx?
C=c1e56d4841ee498894ce700e6122ba69&URL=http%3a%2f%2fwww.icrc.org%2feng%2fresources%2fdocuments%2fnews-

© Copyright 2012, Human Rights Watch

5993

MAKE A DONATION TO AMNESTY BEFORE SEPTEMBER 30 AND YOUR GIFT WILL BE DOUBLED * Up to $200,000 DONATE NOW »

MEMBER CENTER | FIND RESOURCES SEARCH AMNESTY

NEWS EVENTS LO RESEARCH STORE

UR R I DONATE A U US

Pakistan

OUR WORK

ISSUES

CAMPAIGNS

COUNTRIES

Africa »

Americas »

Asia and the Pacific

Afghanistan
Australia
Bangladesh
Bhutan
Brunei Darussalam
Cambodia
China
Fiji
India
Indonesia
Japan
Laos
Malaysia
Maldives
Mongolia
Myanmar
Nepal
New Zealand
North Korea
Pakistan
Papua New Guinea
Philippines
Singapora
Solomon Islands
South Korea
Sri Lanka
Taiwan
Thailand
Timor-Leste
Vanuatu
Viet Nam

Europe »

Middle East and North Africa »

Home › Our Work › Countries › Asia and the Pacific › Pakistan

Like 40

Pakistan Human Rights

Human Rights Concerns

Amnesty International has long been concerned about the persistent pattern human rights violations occurring in Pakistan. Arbitrary detention, torture, deaths in custody, forced disappearances, and extrajudicial execution are rampant. The government of Pakistan has failed to protect individuals – particularly women, religious minorities and children – from violence and other human rights abuses committed in the home, in the community, and while in legal custody. It has failed to ensure legal redress after violations have occurred. In addition, Pakistan continues to impose the death penalty on persons convicted of crimes.

Since 9-11, individuals suspected of having links with "terrorist" organizations have been arbitrarily detained, denied access to lawyers, and turned over to U.S. custody or to the custody of their home country in violation of local and international law.

MORE INFO

GET INVOLVED

Connect: AIUSA South Asia Action Network on Facebook

Read More: EyesOnPakistan.org

Read More: Testimony by T. Kumar before the Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations on Human Rights in Balochistan

PAKISTAN HUMAN RIGHTS UPDATES

US Opposition to Drone Use Growing

As drone use increases -- even by law enforcement in the US -- so does its opposition. Lawmakers in the US have finally started to look more critically at the deadly program.

LEARN MORE VIEW ALL

PRESS RELEASE

Pakistani Girl Accused of Blasphemy Still in Danger Despite Bail

Today's decision by a Pakistan court to grant bail to Rimsha Masih, a 14-year old Christian girl accused of blasphemy, is an encouraging step, but the Pakistani government must urgently reform its blas...

LEARN MORE VIEW ALL

VICTORY

Great News! Abducted Pakistani Journalist Released

Get updates on Amnesty's work to protect human rights in Asia.

YOUR EMAIL ADDRESS

Pakistan: Human Rights Lawyer Still at Risk (UA 164/12)

The authorities appear unable or unwilling to investigate human rights lawyer Asma Jahangir's claims that Pakistan's security forces were behind a plot against her life.

TAKE ACTION

VIEW ALL ACTIONS

Support human rights in Asia and worldwide with a donation to Amnesty today.

DONATE NOW

VIDEO SPOTLIGHT

Where is the justice for Gaza?

VIEW ALL VIDEOS

3367

5994

CASES

VICTORIES

Pakistani journalist Rehmatullah Darpakhel, who was abducted on 11 August 2011, was released on 12 October and is now recovering with his family.

LEARN MORE VIEW ALL

REPORT

Annual Report: Pakistan 2011

LEARN MORE VIEW ALL

RELATED ISSUES AND CAMPAIGNS

Accountability for Torture

Amnesty International believes that the Obama administration and Congress must make accountability for the U.S. government's conduct in the so-called "War on Terror" a high priority.

LEARN MORE

Refugees and Asylum

Refugees leave their country when they fear for their life or that of their family's. Refugees also flee when their government will not or cannot protect them from serious human rights abuses.

LEARN MORE

RESEARCH SPOTLIGHT

The Toxic Truth

Amnesty and Greenpeace join up to expose the environmental and human rights disaster of toxic waste dumping in Cote d'Ivoire.

READ MORE

VIEW ALL REPORTS

KEY COUNTRY

Eyes on Aleppo, Syria

Amnesty releases new satellite images from Aleppo, Syria, showing increased use of heavy weapons near civilian areas.

LEARN MORE

VIEW ALL COUNTRIES

MUSIC FOR AMNESTY

Chimes of Freedom

All profits from Chimes of Freedom, a 4-CD album featuring 76 newly recorded Bob Dylan songs, benefit Amnesty International's human rights work.

LISTEN NOW

SHOP AMNESTY

FEATURED ACTION

Free Pussy Riot

Send your urgent message to Russian authorities now to stop the criminal persecution of Pussy Riot and protect free expression!

TAKE ACTION

VIEW ALL ACTIONS

© 2012 Amnesty International USA | 5 Penn Plaza, New York, NY 10001 | 212.807.8400

7368

MAKE A DONATION TO AMNESTY BEFORE SEPTEMBER 30 AND YOUR GIFT WILL BE DOUBLED *Up to $200,000 DONATE NOW »

Yemen

Like 1

Yemen Human Rights

Human Rights Concerns

Protestors in several cities came under attack by the security forces and other pro-government demonstrators. At least 100 people have been killed during peaceful demonstrations in various cities in Yemen since early February 2011.

Torture and other ill-treatment are widespread practices in Yemen and are committed, generally with impunity, against both detainees held in connection with politically motivated acts or protests and ordinary criminal suspects.

Amnesty International has longstanding concerns about the use of the death penalty in Yemen, particularly as death sentences are often passed after proceedings, which fall short of international standards for fair trial.

Women continued to face discrimination in law and practice and were inadequately protected against domestic and other violence.

MORE INFO

YEMEN HUMAN RIGHTS UPDATES

Drones: The Known Knowns

Presidential adviser John Brennan suggests that drones are effective and legal. Here are 12 reasons why the US needs to rethink their drones program.

LEARN MORE VIEW ALL

NEWS

Yemen's future stability requires human rights action plan

Yemen is on the brink of a human rights crisis unless the authorities act now to end persistent abuses in the country and address past violations.

LEARN MORE VIEW ALL

VICTORY

Great News! Hasson Ba'oom Realeased Without Charge

Hassan Ba'oom, leader of a political opposition group in southern Yemen, was released without charge along with his son Fawaz Ba'oom on 7 December 2011. They had been detained incommunicado since 2...

LEARN MORE VIEW ALL

REPORT

Annual Report: Yemen 2011

Stay informed about human rights in the Middle East and North Africa.

YOUR EMAIL ADDRESS

Tell Russia To Release Pussy Riot!

Three young women have been sentenced to two years in prison by Russian authorities for allegedly performing a protest song in a cathedral as part of feminist punk group "Pussy Riot".

TAKE ACTION

VIEW ALL ACTIONS

Support human rights in the Middle East, North Africa and worldwide with a donation to Amnesty today.

DONATE NOW

VIDEO SPOTLIGHT

Fatima Hussein Badi, Yemen -Write for Rights 2011

VIEW ALL VIDEOS

5996

LEARN MORE VIEW ALL

RELATED ISSUES AND CAMPAIGNS

Censorship and Free Speech

Everyone has the right to seek, receive and impart information and ideas without fear or interference.

LEARN MORE

Security and Human Rights

Amnesty International insists that states must respect human rights in any actions they take in the name of national security or countering terrorism.

LEARN MORE

Accountability for Torture

Amnesty International believes that the Obama administration and Congress must make accountability for the U.S. government's conduct in the so-called "War on Terror" a high priority.

LEARN MORE

FEATURE

Middle East Uprising

Repressive governments across the Middle East and North Africa are under pressure and face surging demands for political, economic and social reform.

LEARN MORE

RESEARCH SPOTLIGHT

The Toxic Truth

Amnesty and Greenpeace join up to expose the environmental and human rights disaster of toxic waste dumping in Cote d'Ivoire.

READ MORE

VIEW ALL REPORTS

KEY COUNTRY

Eyes on Aleppo, Syria

Amnesty releases new satellite images from Aleppo, Syria, showing increased use of heavy weapons near civilian areas.

LEARN MORE

VIEW ALL COUNTRIES

MUSIC FOR AMNESTY

Chimes of Freedom

All profits from Chimes of Freedom, a 4-CD album featuring 76 newly recorded Bob Dylan songs, benefit Amnesty International's human rights work.

LISTEN NOW

SHOP AMNESTY

FEATURED ACTION

Free Pussy Riot

Send your urgent message to Russian authorities now to stop the criminal persecution of Pussy Riot and protect free expression!

TAKE ACTION

VIEW ALL ACTIONS

© 2012 Amnesty International USA | 5 Penn Plaza, New York, NY 10001 | 212.807.8400

3370

5997

Sign into the Guardian using your Facebook account

theguardian

Printing sponsored by:
Kodak
All-in-One Printers

Al-Qaida: US support for Yemen crackdown led to attack

US has increased military aid package to Yemen from less than $11m in 2006 to more than $70m in 2009

Hugh Macleod in Sana'a
The Guardian, Monday 28 December 2009 22.00 GMT

Al-Qaida in Yemen has been galvanised into winning local support over recent months by direct US and British support for Yemen's counter-terrorism efforts, according to sources close to the group.

Its statement yesterday saying the attempted bombing on Christmas Day was in retaliation for US attacks on the group in Yemen follows a year in which the US spent tens of millions of dollars boosting Yemen's coastguard and border security and providing helicopters with night-vision cameras.

Defence analysts and Yemen observers say that the US has also provided intelligence gathered over Yemen by unmanned drones.

The US has increased its military aid package to Yemen from less than $11m in 2006 to more than $70m this year, as well as providing up to $121m for development over the next three years.

The UK has also invested heavily in aid to Yemen. It has quadrupled its development assistance since 2007, allocating £105m between 2009 and 2011, though no figures on funds for military training were available.

Both the US and UK have trained Yemen's counter-terrorism unit, an elite squad of several hundred, including women, who specialise in intelligence gathering and raids on suspected al-Qaida bases.

On 15 December, the Yemeni airforce and ground troops launched a three-day offensive against al-Qaida training camps and bases in the eastern governorates of Marib, al-Jawf, Shebwa and Abyan, claiming to have killed or arrested scores of fighters and foiled a series of suicide bombings planned to mark the Islamic new year.

Following further airstrikes in Shebwa on 24 December, authorities claimed to have killed at least 30 al-Qaida members who had gathered for a meeting, though it remains unconfirmed whether the dead included the top leadership. Yemen's defence ministry said that the strikes had foiled an al-Qaida plot to attack the British embassy in Sana'a, which has been threatened several times since 2005.

A Foreign Office spokeswoman said she was unable to comment on security issues but confirmed that the UK was continuing to work closely with Yemeni authorities to counter the threat of terrorism.

Opposition news sources in Yemen reported that the airstrikes on Christmas Eve had killed members of local tribes, including women and children.

A senior Yemeni military source, speaking anonymously to the Guardian at the time of the first attack, said the operation had been launched after al-Qaida made direct threats against Yemen's president, Ali Abdullah Saleh, and his family.

3231

5998

American media reported that the attacks involved US warplanes, launched from carriers in the Gulf, but the Yemeni source said that the US had co-operated on the intelligence side only. According to the source, Barack Obama telephoned to congratulate Saleh immediately after the operation.

Sources with knowledge of al-Qaida's thinking in Yemen warn that the offensive risks plunging Saleh's regime into another war it would struggle to win, and that it could put Yemen into a situation similar to that existing in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

"The US airforce has been flying over eastern and southern areas of Yemen taking pictures of what they think are training camps for al-Qaida. The Yemeni airforce attacked these places. Just as in Waziristan [Pakistan], the US involvement led to civilian casualties, which mean people will join al-Qaida in revenge," said Shaea, an al-Qaida expert.

© 2012 Guardian News and Media Limited or its affiliated companies. All rights reserved.

3372

SPECIAL COURT FOR SIERRA LEONE
DOKTER VAN DER STAMSTRAAT 1• 2265 BC LEIDSCHENDAM • THE NETHERLANDS

PHONE: +31 70 515 9701 or +31 70 515 (+Ext 9725)

Court Management Section – Court Records

CONFIDENTIAL DOCUMENT CERTIFICATE

This certificate replaces the following confidential document which has been filed in the Confidential Case File.

Case Name: The Prosecutor – v- Charles Ghankay Taylor
Case Number: SCSL-03-01-A Document Index Number: 1348
Document Date: 31 October, 2012
Filing Date: 2 November, 2012
Document Type: Confidential Annex B amended book of authorities to the Defence Rule 111 submissions`

Number of Pages: 313 Number from: 5999-6311

☐Application ☐Order ☐Indictment ■Other ☐Response ☐Correspondence

Document Title:

Public with Public Annex A and Confidential Annex B amended book of authorities to the Defence Rule 111 submissions

Name of Officer:

Zainab T. Fofanah

Signed: Fofanah.